

FIFTY-TWO SUNDAYS

TO

HORSE-SAGE-ISM

Autobiography,
Equine Guided Journey in Life Leadership,
&
Memoirs on How to Live a Lifetime

The Ultra Elite Culture for Humanity

By:

Dave Rossiter

Acknowledgments

To All the Horses and Special People in my Life who Helped Me Discover and Live the Ultimate Elite Culture, aka, Horsesageism

Forward

Dave, here's the deal on this horse. I saw her buck out at Pueblo last weekend. She takes a big first jump out of the chute, so she is hard to mark out. Then she ducks hard to the left on the third jump. If you make it past that, she is straight on with some good drop. Keep charging the front end and you will be in the money", said Mike as we set my riggin. The national anthem finishes up and while the grand entry riders exit the arena the announcer says the all too familiar words, "Pull 'em down boys" as Mike takes one more pull on my riggin. Then just before I nodded for the gate, I heard the same words I had heard lots of times before, by the same two cast of characters: Mike yelled "Bear Down Cowboy", followed by Walt Alsbaugh saying in a monotone voice, "Don't waste this horse kid", as he tightened the flank strap. They pull the gate and I'm looking for eight, as she explodes out, with my spurs sunk over the point of her shoulders. They pull the gate, and I'm looking for eight, as she explodes out, with my spurs sunk over the point of her shoulders.

"Your time is limited, so don't waste it living someone else's life. Don't be trapped by dogma-which is living with the results of other people's thinking"-Steve Jobs

"So, here we are, me and my buddy Dwight standing in knee deep water at "Dig Me" beach, along with a thousand other triathletes waiting for the cannon explosion to signal the start of the rough water, ocean swim. Not only is this my first triathlon, but it's also the 1982 Ironman Triathlon in Kona Hawaii, which at the time, was considered the pinnacle of endurance racing. The sun is just starting to come up as everyone watches Captain Beans glass bottom boat head out to the open ocean. I could barely see it when it finally stopped and set anchor waiting for the race to start so the VIPs on board could watch the swimmers make the turn around their boat and head back to the harbor to complete the 2.4 mile swim. I told myself, that I had put a lot of time into training for this race, and that I should have no problem finishing under the 18-hour cutoff time. Now it's just a matter of getting my mind ready for the race. Then, I thought to myself, it always helped me to visualize an eight second bull ride, just before pulling my bull rope, so why not try it here. So, I close my eyes and visualize: Cannon goes off, swim off to the left side of the crowd so you don't get knocked around. Site Beans boat every five strokes at the top of the swells to the turnaround. The second 1.2 miles to the pier will be a piece of cake as the waves will be helping you in. When you get out of the water just stay relaxed as you go down row 700 to your bike. Put on your bike stuff and walk through the transition area before getting on your bike in the mounting zone. It's a long day, walking will loosen those legs up for the 112-mile bike ride. Up the hill and left onto the King K Highway. Enjoy the view of the ocean on the left and the lava fields that will be heating up as you make your way to the little town of Havi and the turnaround. Force yourself to drink, and keep fueling, just like you did in training. The last ten miles to Havi are going to be super windy and mostly uphill, so error to an easier gear, to save your legs for the run. At the turnaround, remind yourself that you have ten miles of downhill to spin your legs out, but you will be dealing with the afternoon heat coming off the lava fields for the rest of the ride to the transition, at the Kona Surf Hotel, which is on the south end of downtown Kona. Take your time changing into your running stuff, and don't forget to put your belt on with your running number. Walk up the short climb out of the transition and ease into the first several miles through town with all of spectators cheering. You have 26.2 miles, but don't think of it that way. Aid stations are each mile, so treat it as 26 one mile runs. When you get to the turnaround it will be dark, but just tell yourself that it won't be long before your running down Alihi drive to the finish line, with all of the people cheering, and the announcer saying: Number 784, you are an Ironman.

As they are doing the countdown to the start of the race, I say to myself, Bear Down Cowboy, and I'm looking, not for eight this time, but under 18 when they shoot the cannon off!

"Get busy living or get busy dying."-Stephen King

Boy, I am both flattered and dumbfounded to say the least", I said. I never expected this. You can add this request to the evolution of the restaurant and supermarket home deliveries as some of the few positives that came out of Covid". They all looked at each other wondering where that statement came from. "So how do you want to proceed?" "Well," said Kelli, since we are getting back together every Sunday night for family dinner again, why don't we all agree that you will use about 30 minutes during dinner for a story telling session. How's that sound dad?" "Book it guys", I said. See everybody next Sunday, when I will begin by finishing the story on going to Pres's house. Oh, and one last thing. Let's all give Max a nice round of applause for the fine presentation." "Thanks everybody" said Max, as he raised his glass of water to give a toast and said: "Here's to having no regrets dad!

"In order to write about life, first you must live it"-Ernest Hemingway

"In order to write about a great life, you must first, live a great life"-Dave Rossiter

CONTENTS

Preface

Introduction

Part 1- Horses, The Power of Their Presence No Matter How Remote

Chapter 1- The First Encounter

Chapter 2- Separation Anxiety and a Pugsly Look Alike

Chapter 3- Lifestyles of the Not So Rich, and Not So Famous

Chapter 4- The Big Compromise

Chapter 5- Collect for the Post

Part 2- A Journey from City Slicker to Beat Up City Slicker

Chapter 6-Ginger and Another Step Closer

Chapter 7-A Dream Come True, Turns into Black and Blue

Chapter 8-The Big Break-Meeting a Real Cowboy

Chapter 9-A Wake-up Call and Sunday Night Story Telling

Part 3- A Journey from City Slicker to Cowboy to Horseman

Sunday #1-A Cowboy and Real Hand

Sunday #2-Mel and the Trip to Wheatland

Sunday #3- Des Moines and the Launch of an Incredibly Diverse and Adventurous Career

Sunday #4- The Forty Year Anniversary

Sunday #5- Ben and the Aero-Commander

Sunday #6- Reality Check, Kids, and Changing Course

Sunday #7- The Missing Link

Part 4- A Journey From Horseman to Trusted Leader and Horse-Sage-Ism

Sunday #8- Navy Seals and Knights of Old

Sunday #9- Research and the Quest for Trust, Respect, and Beyond

Sunday #10-The Horse, I Had it All Wrong

Sunday #11-Transformation From Within, The Ultra Elite Culture (UEC)

Part 5-Believing It Is Living It, and Living It Is Believing It-The Ultra Elite Culture-My One Year Journey

Sunday #12- Planning Out My Journey

Sunday #13- Accepting the Role as a Leader-The Ultimate Commitment

Part 6-The Ultra Elite Culture-Reality Mindset Is the Foundation

Sunday #14-Reality Overview

Sunday #15-RReal Me-Personality, Shell, Consciousness, Wellness

Sunday #16-EEmotional Intelligence and Humor

Sunday #17-Awareness and Reality Illusions

Sunday #18-Living in the Present and Having Presence

Sunday #19-Influences

Sunday #20-Time

Sunday #21-You Are a Trusted and Respected Leader

Part 7-The Ultra Elite Culture-Superior Core Practices

Sunday #22-Superior Core Practices Overview

Obtain and maintain a healthy body and frame of mind for the ultimate in happiness

Sunday #23-Seek Life, Religious, Political and Spiritual Truths

Sunday #24-Underwrite Your Life Plan and Goals

Sunday #25-Purpose and Passions-Find Them and Live Them

Sunday #26-Experience, Truth, Wisdom, Skills Development

Sunday #27-Rewrite Habits, Rituals and Behaviors Playbook

Sunday #28-Inspiration, Motivation, and Work Ethic

Sunday #29-Ownership and Committing to a Life of Pure Awareness

Sunday #30-Results and Rewards

Part 8-The Ultra Elite Culture-Harmonizing Core Values

Sunday #31-Harmonizing Core Values Overview

Sunday #32-Honesty and Truthfulness

Sunday #33-Always Do the Right Thing

Sunday #34-Respect for Yourself and Others, With Clear Boundaries

Sunday#35-Make the C's Work for You: Communication, Compassion, Creativity
,Courage

Sunday #36-Ownership is Leadership: Accountability, Conscientious, Responsible

Sunday #37-Non- Judgmental, Fairness, Empathy, and Love

Sunday #38-Invest in Gratitude, Kindness, Giving, Politeness

Sunday #39-Zone in on Humility

Sunday #40-Influencer-Influence You and Everyone You Come in Contact With

Sunday #41-Non-Assuming

Sunday #42-Get Real and Authentic

Part 9-One Year, One Lifetime, a Life Transformed as a Life Leader

Sunday #43-Horse-Sage-Ism is the Ultra Elite Culture UEC

Sunday #44-The UEC and Peripheral Values and Practices

Sunday #45-The UEC-Self Discovery and a Life Transformed

Part 10-Horse-Sage-Ism and UEC-Horsemanship, Family, Business, and Influencer

Sunday #46-The UEC-Transcending Horsemanship to Horsemanship From Within

Sunday #47-The UEC in Family Leadership

Sunday #48-The UEC in Business Leadership

Sunday #49-The UEC- Influencer and Ambassador

Conclusion:

Sunday #50-Have I Learned How to Live My Best Lifetime?

Sunday #51-Ultra Elite Culture-No Regrets!

Sunday #52-How to Join the Truly Select Few and Become a UEC Team Member

Preface

Homo Sapiens have been on this planet for around 200,000 years. Whether it was a result of evolution or by some other means, humans separated themselves from other animal species on earth, by having an executive functioning part of their brain. The executive frontal lobes account for around 40% of the human brain and are much larger in humans compared to our closest non-human primate relatives.

Just like that, the planet was now home to a free-thinking species that wonders why they are here, where they are going after death, and at a loss as to how to get along with each other, since they all have differing ideas and beliefs based on how they see their environment.

Just imagine early cave men deciding to join forces and start sharing a cave, and all the duties required to survive. After about a week of trying to work together, problems start to arise between cave members, such as, what is acceptable behavior, and what to do with lazy members that don't do their fair share. I could probably do a whole chapter on the possible issues and differences even after a week, but I think you get the picture. Anyway, this necessitates an individual or group of individuals to come up with some sort of culture to define and manage the group. Very simply, culture, as I see it, consists of the beliefs, behaviors, values, practices, objects, and other characteristics common to the members of a particular family, group, tribe, or society. This description could also apply to an individual, as well.

The newly formed culture consists of beliefs including gods, religions, political/governing system, and whatever else the leaders of the group come up with. Now that a culture is in place, the group grows into a tribe where members buy in and share similar beliefs especially related to religion and political/governing structure. I think it is worth mentioning, as a side note, that there is a lot of research that supports the contention that many religions were invented to control and govern people, with new ones springing up when there was dissatisfaction with the current ruling system. Interesting to say the least.

We now have a tribe of cave folks that have a sense of belonging and have decided to follow each other within that group. For those members who don't agree, they can either leave and go find another tribe, or make changes more to their liking within the tribe. Either option usually comes with conflict, mistreatment and killing each other. More on these sub-cultures in a minute. The members of the new cave man tribe now share the same culture unique to the group. From there, the group defends their culture from real and perceived enemies including other tribes and ethnic groups. Emphasis is put on the importance of passing down the tribe's unique culture to the offspring of the group. As time goes by, more and more cave folks form new cultures/tribes, or join existing ones. Before we know it, humans inhabit places all over the world existing in their unique cultures, tribes, and societies. Oh, and one other phenomenon begins to occur. Most every culture, tribe, and society believe that theirs is better than everyone else's, so they push their way of thinking and doing things on those cultures, tribes, and societies that are different, or disagree with them. This is especially true when it comes to governing/politics, and religious beliefs. And the outcome usually involves human conflict, mistreatment, and killing each other.

The 200,000-year road to modern day society has not been a pretty one. Sure, some human societies have made it to developed status, and or, to an industrialized country-mature and sophisticated economy, advanced technological infrastructure and diverse industrial and service sectors. But nothing has really changed from the early cave man days when it comes to differences in cultural, tribal, societal, political/governing, and religious beliefs as the root cause of human's inability to get along. And when you add to that, the fact that every human has their own unique individual culture, families have a unique culture, and groups within a tribe and society have their own unique cultures. things really get complicated. Think about it. History shows us that subcultures of extreme groups can form, reverting to conflict and tribalism within a society. Depending how it is resolved, more often than not, humans end up mistreating, or killing each other. In fact, this very thing is happening right here in the United States. The republican and democratic parties have polarized, there is clear and present danger to our democracy, and the possibility of authoritarian rule is in the conversation.

Not to sound like a broken record, but the result has remained the same during the 200,000-year human experiment. Humans continue to mistreat and kill their own species, primarily due to the differences I just discussed. Oh, ya, you can also throw in ethnicity, which kind of fits in the cultural box, but skin color is another one that fits in a box of its own. What species would kill and mistreat their own kind, just because they are a different color? Complicated!

As a member of modern-day society, I was very lucky to have been born and raised in a developed country by caring and loving parents that had a family culture characterized by mostly good values and practices. Their beliefs included the Catholic religion, and republican views in a democratic and capitalistic society. There were, however, toxic components including: Catholicism and capitalism to an extreme, and racism, sexism, homophobia, and white supremacy to name a few.

I sometimes wonder why I was so fortunate to begin my life in a time and place so much better than the living environment endured by most other humans in this world, past and present. Luck of the draw, I guess. And before I forget to mention it, both of my parents served in World War II, I vividly remember as a kid how close we came to World War III with the Cuban missile crisis, then the Korean War, how I barely missed getting drafted during the Vietnam War after high school, and the subsequent wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and still counting. Way to go humans, your conflict streak remains intact.

You're probably scratching your head, asking yourself where I am going with this mostly negative assessment of humans. Very simply, I came to the realization that all humans perceive the world differently with their perceptions and beliefs shaped by their environment. Beginning from the day you are born, the development of your perceptions and beliefs are being decided by someone else, and other outside factors as you experience life. First you are assigned a name, then whatever family culture, (If you are lucky enough to have a family), you are born into, starts the process of building a shell so to speak, around the true you. This shell continues to grow in layers as you go through life, heavily influenced by factors such as your assumptions, how you think you are perceived by others, your ism's (racism, sexism, capitalism, socialism, Buddhism, Hinduism, Mormonism, Communism, etc.) The list of ism's humans adheres to is literally immense. They take on such a broad description, the important thing to remember is that toxic ism's usually are reality illusions. But always remember that Horse-Sage-Ism is a good ism! The point is, if left unchecked, your shell layers of reality illusions will continue to multiply as you travel down the road of life.

In the following chapters I am going to take you through my life journey of transformation and self-discovery. During my journey I learned that the vast majority of humans, including myself, develop a toxic personal culture based on, marginal values and practices, combined with a unique shell infested by reality illusions. It is this toxic culture, mainly underpinned by faulty values/practices, and reality illusions, that prevent most humans from living their best life during their brief time here on earth. If I have scared you with this non-conventional line of thinking, and frankly, a dose of reality, don't give up reading quite yet. Or, if I have sparked some concern that you may not be living your best life, we are off to a go start.

Fortunately, my life with horses has been, and continues to be instrumental in helping me transform my toxic culture, by discovering, adopting, and practicing a personal culture comprised of awareness, harmonizing core values, superior core practices, and attention to consistently deflecting shell illusions. I am now living my best life, as the true me. My priority is to live in the present moment, with me, and only me, as my life leader. Let me show you how. You only have one life to live, as far as I know. Why waste it like almost everyone else has, does, and will continue to do. Horses have survived for over 50 million years compared to our mere 200,000-year existence. It is their wisdom that offers us an alternative in life, if we are willing to listen and take action.

Introduction:

Allen J. Hamilton in his book entitled Zen Mind Zen Horse tells the story of The Japanese Horse Master. It goes like this: There's a wonderful story about a Japanese horse master who had lived to be one hundred years old and lay on his deathbed expressing regret that the end was near. His oldest, most dutiful son was at his side, attending to him.

Suddenly the old man sighed and said, "What a pity that I must die now, at this time."

The son looked back at his father with disbelief and said, "Father, how can you have regrets about dying now? You are one hundred years old. No one in our village is older, wiser, or more revered than you are. You are the most celebrated horseman in Japan. Could anyone ask for more? Why despair about dying?"

"Because", said the old man, "it was just last week that I began to truly understand what horsemanship is about. It's such a pity to die now. I was off to a good start!"

Way back in July 1976 I had the good fortune to attend a two-day colt starting clinic in Wheatland Wyoming put on by a true legend in horsemanship-Ray Hunt. Ray and the Dorrance brothers probably did more to change how humans interact with horses in a positive way, than anyone else in horse-human history.

Ray passed away several years ago, but his legacy will live on for many years to come. Ray was similar to the Japanese Horse Master described by Allen. He considered good horsemanship a metaphor that could be applied to everything else in one's life.

Anyway, during the clinic, about 20 of us are riding our colts around the arena with Ray shouting out instructions and some of his famous "Cowboy Logic" one liners. "Why does it take a lifetime to learn how to live a lifetime?" Ray boldly shouted. Everybody kind of looked at each other sort of wondering what that had to do with horses, then he moved on to yelling out more of his logic: Fix it up and let him find it! Feel Timing Balance! Make the wrong thing difficult, and the right thing easy! Recognize the smallest change, the slightest try! I thought to myself, Man, I have never heard this stuff before, if this guy is the real deal, I have a lot to learn.

Turns out Ray was the real deal! and in the many years since 1976 I have come to appreciate what these horse/life philosophers like Ray and the Japanese Horse Master are trying to tell us. The parallel between Horsemanship and Life is real, and to be honest with you, quite eerie.

Biomimicry is defined as an approach to innovation that seeks sustainable solutions to human challenges by emulating nature's time-tested patterns and strategies. The core idea is that nature has already solved many of the problems we humans grapple with. In my 60 plus years of interacting with horses, I am here to tell you that nature via horses does in fact offer solutions to many of our life challenges if we are willing to listen and learn from them.

“Don’t let people discourage you from living your dreams”

David DeNotaris

Part 1-Horses, The Power of Their Presence, No Matter How Remote

Chapter 1 The First Encounter

The oldest of four kids, I grew up in a suburb of Denver Colorado. Early on, there were wheat fields by our neighborhood. My dream to be around horses and become a cowboy is my earliest and most vivid memory. We had middle class neighbors. We knew most of them. No horse folks, just nice people raising a family. Times and roles in the 50's and 60's were much different. The dad's role was to work while the mom stayed home doing the cooking, cleaning and everything else that was deemed "woman's work" at the time. In fact, living up to your role was so important, a story about my dad rings true. As my mom tells it, when they were first married, she would pack my dad's lunch box, he would catch the bus to work, and return each evening with a home cooked meal waiting for him. This went on for a month or so until he announced one night at dinner that he had finally landed a job. Turns out he didn't have a job the whole time, and he just rode the bus around most of the day looking for a job. Guess he rationalized that it was his role to go to work every day, even if he didn't have a job. Interesting.

Anyway, my dad worked for many years at Gates Rubber Company as an industrial engineer until he passed away at age 50. And my mom was a traditional stay at home mom, who eventually went back to work as a registered nurse when us kids got older. My dad was a horseman if you count going to the track every weekend to bet on the ponies. Watching from the rail would push his comfort level. He was scared to death of horses. My mom grew up in a small Nebraska farm town. She had no experience with horses, no interest in horses, but probably gave me some kind of horse DNA going back to her distant farmer relatives. So, you can see, the thought of horses inspiring me was improbable. But as far back as I can remember, I was, and still am, under their spell.

I would be twelve years old before actually owning my own horse. Sure, before that, I was always an animal person. Dogs, rabbits, turtles, hamsters, fish, you name it, I always had pets around. But to this day, I still remember going to bed early on a Friday night so Saturday morning would arrive quicker. That's when my favorite time of the week would begin. I would watch Fury, Sky King, Roy Rogers, Lone Ranger, and the Rifleman. Then that night, I would get to stay up and watch Bonanza and Gunsmoke. Then to finish off the weekend I never missed the High Chaparral. I would marvel at the horses, and dream of being a cowboy. So as a kid, I did not feel an absence of the horse, but rather the power of their presence, no matter how remote.

Charles Rossiter, my dad. Great father, and husband to my hero mom Dorothy who my dad called "Liz". We called him "Pop" instead of dad for whatever reason. He was born and raised in Omaha, Nebraska along with his two brothers Todd, and Dave, and sister Peggy. Never met my grandfather who had passed on before I was born, but his mom was a real gem. She was of Irish descent with a maiden name of Ratigan. All of her kids were musically inclined, just like she was. Never could read music, but sing her a song or play it on a record player, and she could play it back perfectly on the piano. All four kids had a great voice, and they all could play musical instruments. No horse DNA there. Grandma Rossiter was a real people person, just like dad. They both had a great sense of humor, however Grandma never showed much of a temper as compared to dad. In fact, I remember one time when she came to visit. While she was taking a shower, brother Jim snuck in the bathroom, grabbed her false teeth that she had set on the sink, and flushed them down the toilet. Dad beat the tar out of Jim, and grandma just chuckled. She was kind of hard to understand the rest of her vacation since she didn't have a spare set of teeth with her.

From what I remember, she worked at Cantoni's restaurant in Omaha for many years as a cashier. Over the years she saved a lot of rare coins that passed through her cash register, which she gave me years later since I was her first grandchild. I still have the collection to this day even though during tough times I was very tempted to cash them in. Sure, glad I didn't. Now I have to decide who I will pass them on to. Probably my first grandchild Tenley. After grandma passed away I learned that her other role at the restaurant was acting as the resident bookie for Cantoni customers. She always worked the night shift so that her customers could place their bets with her for the next day's horse races at Aksarben (Notice it is Nebraska spelled backwards) Racetrack. Then she would go to the track the next day and place all of the bets, and cash in the winners. Not sure what her cut was, but I would guess it paid more than tips in the restaurant.

Anyway, she loved us kids, and always looked forward to our summer trip to stay with her. She still lived in the old three-story house that the kids grew up in. We would make the 500-mile trek from Denver to Omaha, which back then was a real journey. We stopped a lot for bathroom breaks, while dad filled the oil and checked the gas. He would appropriately call all of his cars a jalopy. Not a real car buff or accomplished mechanic. In fact, he was so inept at fixing things he would need a box of band aids after changing his license plates every year. Looking back, I think he figured the money he would waste on a new car would be better spent on the family, Saturday morning golf, Saturday afternoon horse races, Wednesday night bowling, Thursday poker night, and Saturday night bingo at the church.

On the very first trip to Omaha, which by the way, I remember better than any of the others, it was like a family reunion. The first night started with dinner and everyone except the kids sitting around the kitchen table drinking beer and playing cards. My grandmother stopped the game to make some announcements. First off, it was getting late. Bud (my dad's grownup nickname) and Todd, you need to set up the baby bed for Jim (my little brother who was one at the time). And kids, tomorrow morning you can go through everything under the old staircase. It is full of toys and stuff from when your father, Uncle Todd, and Dave, and Aunt Peggy were growing up. And Sunday night we are going to dinner at my friend's house. Little Dave, they have horses. After that announcement, all I could think about was Sunday.

Well, everyone went to bed late as Bud and Todd had some problems assembling the baby bed. Around 3 am the next morning we heard a loud crash upstairs and my brother screaming bloody murder. The baby bed collapsed due to an assembly flaw. Jim survived the collapse, and it took my mom a while to speak to dad again. Good music genes, not so good at common sense and reading directions. Or maybe it was too much Falstaff and Pabst Blue Ribbon beer.

So, after breakfast we are all ready to tear into the goods under the mystery staircase. The house was a huge Victorian style mansion (seemed like a mansion to a 6-year-old kid) with the elaborate dark wood staircase that climbed to the second and third story. Todd and his Falstaff had me pretty leery of entering the darkness under the staircase as he cautioned us the night before about the possibility of unknown demons, since nobody had been in there for many years.

Since I was the oldest, I figured I would man up and be the first to enter through the half size door and fend off whatever danger lurked. No light under there, so Grandma handed me a flashlight. Before I entered, I kept telling myself, be careful because you can't miss tomorrow. Dinner at the horse place. So, I walked in and much to my surprise there was a mountain of cool stuff. I handed out tennis racquets, roller skates, dolls, baseball bats and baseball gloves. It was like Christmas morning all over again. Sister Pam was not really excited since most of it was guy stuff. And Jim was too small to really appreciate how cool some of these things really were. And sister Deb was not born yet. I kept digging and toward the back I came across the krem de la krem, a pair of cowboy boots. They say timing is everything. What are the odds of finding a pair of cowboy boots the day before the first encounter with a horse.

I immediately dusted them off and slipped them on. They were a size 9, and I was 6 years old, so go figure. Grandma said, "Little Dave, those belonged to your dad when he went to the University of Wyoming in Laramie". Mom said "Boy, they look brand new", and my dad replied, "Ya I bought them to try and fit in with all my cowboy classmates, but they hurt my feet". Another indication that horse and cowboy DNA did not exist, but hey, now I had a pair of cowboy boots. I wore them all day and to bed that night. I learned how to walk shuffling my feet so they wouldn't fall off.

The big day had finally arrived. It was Sunday afternoon, and we were all heading out to have dinner with Grandma's horse friend. This was my big debut as a cowboy and my first encounter with a live horse. I had my boots on with my jeans tucked in the top because they were so big my jeans wouldn't fit over them. That was OK though. That's exactly how Roy Rogers wore his. I had a red neckerchief around my neck and donned a brand-new white cowboy hat that Uncle Dave bought me the day before. I can still feel the excitement like it was yesterday. In my own mind I was convinced that I really was a cowboy, and that I knew about everything there was to know about horses.

About 45 minutes later we drove through the gate of a nice country estate. There were some horses out in the pasture grazing, surrounded by a nice white fence, only taking notice when we piled out of the car. There was a nice barn next to the house with a couple of dogs sleeping in the breezeway. We went up to the door and Grandma introduced everybody. I don't remember their names, but the husband was a big heavy-set guy with a deep voice. He had a cigar in his mouth and a can of beer in one hand. His wife was tall and slender and from the minute we met, I did not like her, and she did not like me. She looked at me laughing, commenting that he must want to be a cowboy when he grows up. Everybody laughed except me. I already am a cowboy.

Well, they herded us through the house into their backyard for a nice country barbeque. Pam and I sat there quietly until I couldn't stand it any longer. I went to Grandma and asked if I could go look around. She asked her friend permission, and her response was: "We are not used to having little kids on the property, so after dinner we can give you a quick tour. Our brood mares are in the pasture and our stud horse is in the barn. Much too dangerous for a 6-year-old kid to be wandering around on his own." "Oh, that's fine", said Grandma. A glance from my dad reinforced that I better not wander off.

So, after dinner we walked out to the barn. Standing in the stall was a big black stud horse. As the husband approached him, he wheeled around kicking the stall door, and stood there shaking. The wife said the horse was dangerous and that her husband was the only one that could handle him. He made all of us stand back while he entered the stall, put a stud chain on him, and started jerking him around until he stood still just shaking. All the non-cowboys in the crowd stood there in awe as this big fat guy muscled this horse around. I was just thinking of how to get back out here so I could get better acquainted with this cool looking horse.

When the show was over, we all filed back through the house to the back yard. Since all the mares were visible from the back yard, my only chance was to get back to the stud horse. So, when everybody dug into the homemade ice cream, I told my mom I didn't feel well and that I was going to lay down in the car. That's fine, she said. So off I went to the barn. I walked up to the stud horse, and he wheeled around and kicked. I stood there for about 5 minutes until he turned around and put his nose through the fence. The first thing I noticed was that he was not shaking, and he seemed to be totally relaxed with me. And believe it or not, for some reason I was also totally relaxed with no fear. I took a brush that was sitting on top of a nearby bale of hay, took off my boots, and climbed up on the stall gate. I sat on top of the gate and started brushing his back as he leaned over.

What an awesome feeling. Such a huge powerful animal that really seemed to like being around me. “What are you doing you stupid kid. Get down from there before you are killed” I knew I didn’t like that lady. She pulled me down from the fence in a fit of anger, and drug me out to the car where everybody was waiting. It was a long ride home getting verbally abused by my dad. My Grandma didn’t seem too upset saying that her friend was a little high strung, and that she was just worried about my safety. But deep down I think she understood my love for horses. Maybe not the best outcome, but a big step towards becoming a real cowboy and horseman. Oh, and to make matters worse we had to turn back around halfway home to go back and get my boots that were still in the barn.

Chapter 2 Separation Anxiety and a Pugsly Look Alike

Here we are, making the trek back home to Denver from Omaha. I am still buzzed by my first encounter with a horse, and it's all I keep thinking about. I am sitting in the back seat with my sister Pam and little brother Jim. Dad's driving while mom is sound asleep. I guess Dad's singing just put her to sleep. You see, he was a really good singer who thought he sounded just like Bing Crosby. He was good, but luckily, he stuck with his day job. Anyway, no seat belts back in those days, so everybody was free to move around. We would fight for window positions, and for the prime location, lying in the back window. It was a 1950's green Buick sedan with no air conditioning. Since it was August all the windows were down, so it was hot and windy.

Dad always had gimmicks to try and keep us occupied. In those days the roads were just a two lane, so passing slower traffic was always interesting in Dad's jalopy with minimal power. Anyway, he would have us count cars with Colorado license plates when in Nebraska, and vice versa when we were in Colorado. Then he would always blink his headlights at oncoming trucks to see if they would do the same. And his favorite was having us hang out the window when passing a truck giving the horn signal. It was a real treat when the trucker would then blow his horn when we passed him.

There was always something unique about Dad and driving. It seemed like driving a car was his form of doing yoga. He would wear big aviator glasses that you could flip up and down depending on the intensity of the sun. And he would stretch out on the car seat with his left arm leaning out the window and his right arm centered on the steering wheel. It was truly poetry in motion. In fact, he liked driving so much that almost every evening in the summer after dinner, he would take us for a spin as he called it. He would load us all up and we would drive from our house at 2564 South Yates, down Sheridan Blvd, past Bear Valley shopping center, through BelMar estates where all the rich folks lived, then down the hill to Centennial Horse Racetrack. He knew the guard at the gate who would wave us through, and we would drive around the barn area looking at all of the racehorses sticking their heads out of their stall door. I was never allowed to get out of the car, but at least I got to see horses. Then before we returned home, we would stop at the A&W drive in for a root beer float. I certainly liked seeing the horses, but it was sure hard to beat that root beer float on a hot summer night.

Anyway, Dad finally quit singing and my mom woke up asking where we were. "About an hour from home Liz" dad said. Then my mom started going over everything I was going to need before starting school after the Labor Day weekend. "Since you turned 6 last December, you are going to be older than most of the other kids in your kindergarten class,” said Mom. That didn’t make me feel much better since I was basically kind of an insecure little kid, not looking forward to my first day of school. Oh well, I will think about that later. Back to thinking about my first encounter. I keep thinking about how the fat guy interacted so forcefully with that horse. I never saw the Lone Ranger or Roy Rogers act mean to their horses. I like how the Ranger and Roy treat their horses as friends rather than scaring them to death. When I get my horse, we are going to be friends.

In an era when women were expected to do housework, shopping, laundry, etc., dad broke the mold in a couple of areas. He did all the grocery shopping, and clothes shopping for us kids. He was always looking for deals, so naturally he gravitated to a local discount clothing store called Sell-Low. Every fall before school started, Dad would buy us our school clothes for the year. So, dad buys me a new pair of off brand jeans, two shirts, a winter coat, and a pair of dress shoes for my first day of kindergarten. Since I was kind of a chubby kid, no not kind of, I was chubby, the jeans were way too long since they had to fit my waist. Not a problem. Back then you just rolled them up and you just grew into them. And since I had wide feet, the cheap shoes were narrow and always hurt my feet. That’s ok, they will stretch out over time.

Our house was a massive 1,400 square foot tri-level brick house. It was in a middle-class neighborhood where basically everybody knew their neighbors and spent a lot of time socializing with each other. Doull Elementary School was exactly 5 blocks away. No need for a school bus, as it was in easy walking distance for even a kid in kindergarten.

The night before, at dinner, Mom explained to my dad that the school requires a parent to drop their kid off the first day so that she can meet them and discuss any issues the kid might have. Dad naturally volunteered since he could just drop me off on his way to work, and oh by the way, they only had one car anyway. So, the big day arrives. I had a fresh buzz haircut, brand new blue jeans, neatly rolled my legs, big black glasses (I had a lazy right eye) and brand-new shoes that squeaked every time I walked. Actually, I looked a lot like Pugsly from the Adams family now that I think about it. In retrospect, living my early years as a goofy looking fat kid with other kids making fun of me, toughened me up to where I quit listening to what other people thought of me. I carry this trait with me today, which has served me very well over the years, for the most part.

Well, I don’t remember much about that first day because I tried to forget about it over the years. You see, we walk into the classroom, Dad meets the teacher (don’t remember her name) walks over to me and shakes my hand while he says, “I will come back for you when you're 18", then leaves the classroom. I was in panic mode and could not hold it any longer, so I started crying. The teacher took me to the side and asked me what was wrong, and I told her what Dad said. She tried to explain that he was just kidding around, but I wasn't buying it. So, she called Mom, who borrowed the neighbor's car and came and got me. Kind of a rough first day that I have tried to forget. Dad didn't mean any harm. It's just that everything in life with him was jokes and fun for the most part. Just rolled off his tongue without even thinking, which as I got older, I grew to appreciate, because he was so funny. Unfortunately, I suffered separation anxiety for a while after that, (not sure that term had been invented yet, but hopefully you get the picture).

The next day I walked to school, and everything went fine except the girl sitting next to me lost control of her bladder soaking one of my new shoes. At least it quit squeaking for a while.

By now you are hopefully getting a sense of the energy and enthusiasm for life that my dad had. He loved to shop, sing in the choir, go bowling, golf, play poker, go to the horse races, play bingo, watch college and AFL football, watch baseball, watch Friday Night at the Fights, and pride himself as always being the center of attention at parties, while singing and telling jokes. Well, you can add one more to the list. He loved Christmas. It was his favorite holiday for a number of reasons. Lots of parties, singing his solo at Notre Dame church (both midnight mass, and high mass on Christmas day), doing all of the Christmas shopping, and probably most of all, watching everybody open presents on Christmas day.

We were only a few weeks away from Christmas and having several months of kindergarten under my belt I was ready for a vacation. It was early on a Monday morning, and we were eating breakfast before school. We had just celebrated Pam's 6th birthday the night before. I would turn 7 in a couple weeks. I hated my December birthday because it was so close to Christmas it was almost an afterthought. Anyway, there was a foot of snow on the ground, and it was freezing out. Dad walked in the house and announced that his car wouldn't start because it was frozen. "Not to worry he said, the problem is being fixed as we speak" A couple minutes later the phone rings and Mom answers it. "Charlie's car is on fire" yelled Ken, our next-door neighbor. Dad ran outside, opened the hood to flames and smoke. He grabbed the garden hose, but it was frozen. Ken, our neighbor ran over with a fire extinguisher and put the fire out. Dad closed the hood, jumped in the car and it started right up. "See I told you the problem was being fixed". Ken just looked at him shaking his head as dad pulled out the outdoor barbeque minus the legs from under the car. The hot charcoal briquettes caused the grease under the engine to catch fire. Lucky for Ken's quick thinking, or the car probably would have burned up while Dad watched it with the frozen hose. An innovative approach, but not much common sense.

This particular Christmas was a rare occasion because Grandma Schafer, Moms Mother, came over from Scottsbluff to spend it with us. She hated leaving home, so I think this was the only time she ever came to visit. Like any kid on Christmas eve, I could hardly sleep. Back then, the Montgomery Ward Department store put out their Christmas catalog six months before Christmas, so I spent a lot of time looking through that catalog to figure out what I wanted for Christmas. As dad would say, "Everything in that catalog is also carried by Santa". I finally settled on a Johnny Reb cannon. It had its own wheels, and you could shoot plastic cannon balls the size of a baseball.

Sure enough, there was the cannon under the tree on Christmas morning. After everybody opened presents, I loaded a cannonball with the official ram rod. It was spring loaded and there was a rope on the side that you pulled to fire, just like the real thing. Mom said, "It's too cold to go outside, so take that thing down in the basement if you are going to shoot it off". So, I drug the cannon to the stairs and on the first step down the bounce on the stairs caused it to misfire. The cannonball ricocheted off of the living room wall and hit Grandma right on the side of the head. Luckily, she was sitting on the couch which allowed for a soft landing when she fell over, out cold.

Mom, being a nurse and all, got grandma revived without serious injury, while Dad was busy jerking my arm out of the socket yelling and screaming at me. Turns out that cannon packed a pretty hard punch, but back then there were no child safety regulations and no safeguard for a misfire.

The day ended up fine and I apologized to grandma. Then a few days later a package arrived from Uncle Todd full of presents. Sure enough, he remembered the catcher's mitt I asked for. I slept with that catcher's mitt along with my cowboy boots for a long time.

Chapter 3 Lifestyles of the Not So Rich and Not So Famous

Ok, moving right along. I thought it would be fun to tell you about how daily life was, back when I was 6 years old, growing up in 1959. Probably the biggest differences from how we live today centers around technology, family tradition, and neighbors. I'll explain the neighbors later, but for now, let me walk you through my daily life back then.

On a typical Saturday morning I would get up early to watch Fury, Sky King, The Rifleman, and my favorite cartoons, Deputy Dog, Road Runner, and the Jetsons. Back then there were only 3 channels, and they only came on between 6 in the morning and 12 o'clock at night. We only had one television and it was, by far, state-of-the-art technology. When you turned on the TV, all the lights in the house would flicker because of the amount of electricity it would take to fire it up. The screen was about 30 inches wide, encased in a wooden console with big control knobs below the screen and above the speaker. The whole unit probably weighed about 300 lbs. because of all the wood and the innards of the TV. The innards consisted of a bunch of different sized tubes that gave off enough radiation to make your hair fall out. Come to think of it, maybe that's why Mom and Dad didn't have more than four kids. In fact, there was a big label on the back of the TV warning of severe electrical shock, and other dangers, if you removed the back cover!

Strategically placed on top of the TV was a contraption called Rabbit Ears. Two antennas came out of the base unit to ensure good reception and the ultimate picture quality. Unfortunately, the technology wasn't that good, resulting in a snowstorm on the screen, more often than not. But, not to worry, some brilliant engineer came up with the idea to wrap aluminum foil around the antennas, which actually, did help. So basically, most households had both Rabbit Ears and the Apple Version of aluminum foil.

About halfway through the Rifleman I would hear the milkman pull up in front of the house and deliver 2 gallons of milk, (no milk cartons back then, all glass bottles) in our milk chute that was located near our back door. The chute had a door on the outside and inside. Some of our neighbors that didn't go with this upgrade when they built their house had to settle for a wooden box on their front porch. Needless to say, our family felt very special to have a milk chute.

No cereal for breakfast on Saturday mornings. Before leaving for golf, dad would drive to a nearby strip center that had a bakery, barbershop, and Italian food joint. He would buy two dozen, hot out of the oven, doughnuts right when they opened, and bring them home for everyone to devour. They sure went down well, washed down with that fresh cold milk!

About the time everybody was finishing breakfast the Bread Man would ring the front doorbell, holding out a huge tray of wonder bread, twinkies, and cupcakes. Mom would buy what she needed to make healthy lunches the next week. To this day, I am still amazed at how Mom could make sandwiches using both hands while smoking a cigarette at the same time.

After breakfast everybody had to go make their bed and pick up their room before they could go outside and play. Mom would decide who could go with dad to the grocery store after his return from golf and mowing the yard if it was summer. While we were cleaning our room, Mom would pull out her S&H Trading Stamp book and paste last week's stamps into the book. Back then, the grocery store and gas stations gave out green stamps based on the amount you spent on purchases. You pasted the stamps into a book that you would turn in for merchandise at the S&H store. Knowing that dad would bring home a bunch more stamps from the gas station and grocery store, she would catch up with the lick and paste process. Mom was obsessed with her green stamps and the stuff she was able to buy with them. We had some of the ugliest dishes and bowls that were vintage S&H.

Once dad got home, he would mow the lawn while Mom started the grocery list. Dad would finish the lawn and come inside to change the grocery list more to his liking. Two of us would jump in the car and wait for dad while we fought for the window seat in the front, (formally known as shotgun). The loser had to sit in the middle or take the back seat. Since there were no seat belts back then, you had plenty of options as to where you could sit, or just lay in the back window, (the back window was the prime location when shotgun was taken by Mom). On the way to King Soopers Supermarket, we would stop for the weekly fill up with gas. No self-service back in those days. The guy would come out and ask how much gas we wanted. While the gas was filling, he would open the hood and check the oil and fluids. He would then proceed to wash all of the windows while making funny faces at us kids. Dad would pay him, (no credit cards back then-cash or check only) collect his green stamps, and off we went to the grocery store.

While we were at the grocery store, Mom would sit and relax in the living room while there was some peace and quiet. Mom and Dad had this fancy stereo that, similar to the TV, was in a big wooden console about 6 feet long. With built in speakers on each side, you opened the top to load a 33 LP Record. I never looked in the back of the stereo, but there were probably radioactive tubes inside that thing as well. Mom's favorite album was the soundtrack (I think the music was produced by Rogers and Hammerstein) of the movie South Pacific. It was released in 1958, and her favorite song was "I'm Gonna Wash That Man Right Outta My Hair". Now that's an interesting title-Any reference to Dad?

From the minute we walk in, to the minute we walk out of the grocery store, everybody we run into is dad's best friend, even if they are perfect strangers. He says hi to everybody, jokes and makes faces at little kids, and flirts with the lady cashiers who all call him Charlie. As the lady checks us out Dad gives careful instructions to the kid bagging our groceries making sure the delicate items like the additional loaves of Wonder Bread that builds bodies 12 ways, doesn't get smashed. Dad pays and bribes the blushing cashier for extra Green Stamps. Sure Charlie, see ya next week! Back then we thought it was fun to get picked for the grocery store detail, but as we got older and realized how embarrassing it was, we politely opted out.

When we pulled up in front of the house dad would blow the horn and Mom would quickly put out her cigarette, turn off the stereo and run outside to help carry in the groceries. With all of the groceries sitting on the kitchen table we would all watch dad methodically put everything away. Being an efficiency engineer and all, no one else could place each and every item in its most efficient space as well as dad. He was definitely a man on a mission with special talents.

After putting away the groceries, utilizing a process that would make Amazon envious, it was time for dad to head to the horse racing track, or to the barber shop. The barbershop was right next door to the bakery, and it had a barber pole at the front door. Three old fashioned swivel barber chairs spanned one wall, about 30 customer chairs along two walls, and a coat and hat rack along the other. In between some of the customer chairs were end tables stacked with magazines and newspapers. No female barbers or patrons, or TVs in those days. This was strictly a hangout for the male gender to discuss everything from sports to politics to women's rights, and get a haircut and shave if you needed one. Jim, the owner, and head barber, wore a white barber jacket that zipped up in front with a big black comb and fancy scissors neatly placed in the front pockets. The other two barbers matched his attire and protocol perfectly. Since Dad, brother Jim, and I all got buzz cuts it didn't take much hair styling to get it right. To this day, I still remember how nervous I would get watching them slap on shaving cream and use a straight razor to give a trusting gent a clean and close shave. And as you would expect, whether in the barber chair or sitting in a customer chair, Dad was always the center of attention, telling jokes or giving his two cents worth on the current topic of discussion. Sports

Clips has nothing on what this place used to be. I'm sure this old establishment as well as the tradition it represented is long gone. Looking back, it was kind of a rite of passage as a young kid to see how grown men should interact in the absence of the female persuasion.

Itching from the haircut we would arrive back home, and I was free to do as I please. If I didn't head out to the backyard, I would hop on my bike to go play ball or just hang out with my buddies. Mom's instructions as I was leaving never changed. "Be home by dark". In this day and age if you told a 6-year-old kid that, not knowing where he was headed without a cell phone, you would be on the evening news in handcuffs. But somehow Mom was always able to stay one step ahead of the law.

On Saturday afternoons when Dad wasn't at the track, he would take over the living room watching sports on the Radiation Box. He would be glued to the TV, and we were advised to only bother him if it was an emergency, which would include getting him another can of Falstaff beer.

As it started to get dark, I would walk in the back door only to find dad complaining to Mom about the stupid neighbor. About the same time, most Saturday nights, Dad would call Bob's Pizzeria to order takeout, (You guessed it, the third trip of the day to the same strip center). Located just inside our back door was the utility room that housed our washing machine, waste basket, milk chute, and our only telephone, which was conveniently located on the wall (Notice I didn't mention a clothes dryer because they were not invented yet. Our dryer was a clothesline in the backyard for warm weather, and a clothesline in the kitchen for cold weather). Our telephone was a rotary dial model, with a 20 foot curly cord so you could walk around while talking. Unfortunately, back then you were on a party line with several other neighbors. That meant, if a neighbor was using the phone, you had to wait until they were finished before you could use the phone. The unwritten rule was that you should not pick up and listen to a neighbor's conversation, but you could interrupt if it was an emergency. One neighbor lady was always hogging the phone on Saturday evenings which usually led to a heated discussion with she and Dad since he would declare an emergency involving Bob's Pizzeria.

So, we would chow down on spaghetti, meatballs, and pizza. Even on the weekends we were required to eat dinner in our kitchen together. We all had assigned seats and a ritual of going around the table telling everybody how our day went. Our kitchen was so small that dad had to pull the table out from the wall so three of us kids could fit into our chairs. He would then push it back, essentially blocking us from getting out. When he said we were not getting up until we finished our food it was pretty much a given! That also applied to listening to his stories and endless jokes, although that was a little easier to tolerate than some of Mom's cooking, (More on that to come).

Well, it's a Saturday night and we all get to stay up until 8:00 watching a snowstorm on the TV and eat homemade popcorn chased down by Shasta Cola. Dad would pop the popcorn on the stove and put it in a paper grocery bag. If dad was gone for any reason, Mom would go the Jiffy Popcorn route since she would usually burn popcorn worse, using Dad's organic method, (Just FYI, I recently saw that Jiffy Pop is on the FDA's list of most dangerous foods.). Coca Cola was too expensive so he would buy Shasta Cola which was much cheaper. We would huddle around the TV watching shows like Father Knows Best, The Andy Griffith Show, and I Love Lucy. Right at 8:00 we were instructed to brush our teeth, put on our pajamas, and hit the sack. I could brush for an hour and still not get the after taste from the Shasta Cola out of my mouth. I guess what doesn't kill ya makes you stronger.

We knew that we had better stay in bed and be quiet because Mom and Dad were now watching the Honeymooners with Jackie Gleason and Art Carney. Mom despised watching what was then Dad's favorite show. Jackie Gleason who played Ralph Cramden, a bus driver, was a real male chauvinist by today's standards, but pretty much the norm for that day and age. Mom just couldn't stand the guy, but usually 10 minutes into the show she was fast asleep, in her favorite chair.

So ends a typical Saturday.

Chapter 4 The Big Compromise

“Class, class, class, that’s the siren going off for our duck and cover drill,” said my third-grade teacher Mrs. Pembridge. I know you’re sick of this daily routine, but one day, maybe sooner than later, it will prove to be the real thing, and it could save your life. So, take your positions right now”.

As I am walking home from school, I am thinking to myself how much I love playing baseball on the church baseball team with my dad as the head coach. It gets a little dicey however, when we lose games. Dad yells at me on the way home, blaming me for the loss, I start crying, and an argument ensues between Mom and Dad with Mom defending me. But hey, all my buddies love playing baseball just like me. I mean, what 10-year-old kid doesn’t love baseball. Roger Marris and Mickey Mantle are household names. But now I am 10 years old, it’s 1962, and I still long to be with horses after my first encounter almost four years ago. Dad always promised us kids that he would buy us a pony if we didn’t smoke cigarettes until our 21st birthday, but there is no way that I am waiting that long for a horse.

As I walk into the house, reality sets in’ as my mom is sitting at the table listening to Walter Cronkite (the most trusted newsman) on the radio. “Wow mom seems like all you do these days is listen to the news”. “I know I do, but your dad and I, as well as just about everybody in this country, is concerned about the Cuba missile crisis, and the possibility of a nuclear war.” “Well, so is Mrs. Pembridge. She keeps making us do those stupid drills every day when the warning siren goes off”, I said.

I hurry and change my clothes so I can head out and meet my buddies for a pickup baseball game. Out the door I go, hollering at Mom over the radio. "Heading out to meet the guy's mom". "Ok, be home by dark for dinner" she said.

As I head home on my bike from baseball, I remind myself that it's Friday night in our Catholic family household, which means some sort of fish for dinner. Mom usually has kitchen duties on Fridays with Dad taking over on Saturday nights with Bob's Pizza, and Sunday nights with some burnt red meat offering on the grill. We would refer to his barbequed hamburgers as hockey pucks so as not to insult him. Anyway, the catch of the day usually came down to either breaded salmon patties with bone chips included, or fish sticks with gourmet tartar sauce on the side. As we all take our seats Dad slides the dinner table in to secure our positions and we are served half frozen fish sticks, raw kidney beans mixed with mayonnaise, and slices of white wonder bread with the option of adding real butter. No tartar sauce tonight because Mom forgot to put it on last week's grocery list, and it got by dad when he redid the list.

While everyone is pushing their food around the plate wondering what to do with it, Mom comments that she isn't all that hungry as she lights up a cigarette. Dad looks around the table and asks who wants to go first on today's happenings. Mom replies: "This Cuba missile thing is really getting scary. I wonder what's going to happen if Kennedy stands up to Russia?" "I don't think we want to know," said Dad. Sister Pam looked at Dad and said: "Can I have some girlfriends over tomorrow night to listen to Beach Boys records? I promise we will stay in my room and not play them too loud". "Sure" said Dad, "but I have to warn you that I have Bingo tomorrow night, so if they want popcorn, Mom is searing her Jiffy Pop."

Dad looked my way and said: "What about you Roy Rogers"? Since the First Encounter he nicknamed me Roy Rogers since I was a self-proclaimed Cowboy. "Just the usual duck and cover drills at school" I replied. So, while everyone is staring at me, I am thinking to myself that no better time than the present to plead my case again. So here goes!

"Mom and Dad, there is something I need to talk to you about" Dad looked at me and said laughing: "You read my mind Roy. I agree, we are in hopeless need of a chef, but we just can't afford it" "Very funny,” said Mom. “Okay, what is it you want to talk about,” said Mom. Dad looked at me and said: “Not this horse thing again. How many times do I have to tell you that I was around horse people in college, and they are very different, and not really what I would describe as ideal role models. Besides, you’re a city kid. Horse people grow up with horse parents. Mom and I are city slickers that don’t know the first thing about horses, nor do we want to, that is unless you have an inside tip on a horse running at the track tomorrow. And on top of that, we can’t afford to send you to a horse person for lessons. So, if that’s what’s on your mind, let’s just end the conversation right there”.

“I am not giving up on horses Dad. Someday I am going to own my own horse and become one of those horse people. I will find a way, but in the meantime, you just gave me a great idea when you mentioned horse lessons. What if I find a job to start saving for a horse, and to pay for someone to give me horse lessons”?

Dad looked at Mom, rolled his eyes and said: “You’re a 10-year-old kid. I don’t know who would hire you, but you’re welcome to give it a shot. If you do find a job, which I seriously doubt, it can’t interfere with school, CYRA baseball, Blue Knights Football, your Saturday bowling league, and your golf lessons. There is nothing more important than getting a good education and playing sports. I look forward to watching you play on the High School and College Baseball and Golf Teams. I just don’t want you to go down the wrong path with horses and miss those opportunities. You’re the oldest kid in the family, and you need to set an example for your sister, and brother, and any future sisters or brothers”, sheepishly winking at my mom.

I glanced over at Mom, and she winked at me when Dad wasn’t looking. I knew she was on my side on this horse deal and that she would keep trying to soften Dad up. At least he didn’t say no, so I ran with this one as a compromising win.

“Thanks Mom and Dad, I will keep you posted on my job search”. My Dad shook his head and said: “Good luck Roy!

‘Oh, and by the way. Kennedy forced the Russians hand, and they returned the missiles from Cuba back to Russia. No more duck and cover drills or a nuclear war-I took that as another win, thinking there were probably some real compromises for that to happen as well!

Chapter 5 Collect for The Post

The grass is turning green, and the trees are starting to bud and grow leaves. That's a sure sign of spring in Colorado, and the end of the school year finally in sight. It's been a mild winter with not as much snow as usual. That put a severe damper on my snow shoveling business, but I am optimistic that the launch of my lawn mowing enterprise will be highly successful. I made enough shoveling snow to buy a power lawn mower and hand clippers for edging, (weed eaters hadn't been invented yet). In a couple of weeks after the Memorial Day weekend, school will be out, and I can start canvassing the neighborhood for customers. They say one of the strongest motivators is proving someone wrong. I tried getting a job as a sweeper boy at our school, cart shagger, and bagger at King Soopers grocery store, and bus boy at Bob's Pizzeria. Same story, different places: "Sorry kid, you're way too young to work here". Oh well, maybe Dad was right, but hey, there is no age requirement for working for myself, so keep plugging away.

It's Sunday morning on Memorial Day weekend. School is out and today is a big day. Dad sets up the portable swimming pool in the backyard for the summer and watches us swim while he barbeques a rump roast on the spit listening to the Indy 500 on a portable radio. We only last about 20 minutes in the pool since the water is just above freezing. Soon dad is left alone at the barbeque, content listening to the race, slapping barbeque sauce on the roast every 20 minutes, and keeping cool with a bottle of Falstaff. What is usually one of the most relaxing days for dad however, got off to somewhat of a rocky start this particular Sunday.

It wasn't the stress of Mom cooking bacon, eggs, and waffles for breakfast that got to him. He was used to the over easy egg order looking like scrambled, and the waffle order cancelled because they stuck to the waffle iron and burned. No, this morning's stressor had to do with the Sunday newspaper.

Dad is standing in front of the picture window that looks out to our front yard and the street. "Come on everybody, breakfast is ready", said Mom from the kitchen. Dad starts shouting. "It's 9:00 on a Sunday morning and our idiot paper boy still hasn't delivered my newspaper yet". "Calm down Buddy, Ralph is a good kid. Maybe a little lazy and unreliable at times, but that's just how he is" said Mom, "Maybe he overslept, or something happened, he's just a 16-year-old kid". "Ya right, he is never on time. The Sunday morning paper is never here by 7:00, and the afternoon papers the rest of the week never get here until dark. And when he does deliver them, good luck guessing which bush they end up under. I have had enough. I am calling the Denver Post right now, to report this moron. Kids these days, they just don't want to work, or take responsibility for anything. What the hell is this world coming to", Dad shouted, with a beet red face. "I wouldn't complain too much" said Mom, "He rarely comes by to "Collect for the Post", so it's almost like you get the paper for free," said Mom.

Dad gave Mom a sneering glance as he looked up the number in the white pages phone book, and picked up the phone, only to hear the voice of the infamous neighbor lady talking away. He slammed the phone down and said, "That's it, I am going to smooth this kid out as soon as he gets here". So, he went to the front door opened it, and stepped out on the front porch, only to find the newspaper laying in a puddle of water from last night's rain storm. While he was on the verge of cardiac arrest, Mom got him cooled down and used her hair dryer to get his newspaper dried out. Dad finally relaxed as he read the sports section eating cold eggs, extra crispy bacon, and a waffle substitute, charred wonder bread toast with grape jelly. A rough start to a Memorial Day weekend tradition, but not all was for not, with Dad's stressful morning!

As we are shivering in the swimming pool while Dad's hard at work at the grill, I am thinking that things surely happen for a reason sometimes. Even though Dad's stressful episode probably aged him a couple of years, it was telling me that I should seize the opportunity at hand and see if I could take over for Ralph as the neighborhood paperboy.

Since Monday was a holiday, I planned on taking action on Tuesday with an altered agenda. Now with the newspaper idea, I would make that a priority ahead of the mowing business. Ralph only lived a couple blocks away, so I rode my bike over to his house about 9:00 on Tuesday morning. I knocked on the door and his mom answered. I asked if Ralph was around and she replied: "Yes, he is still in bed, and he gave me strict orders to not wake him up until noon since he doesn't have to go to school today. Your one of Chuck and Dorothy's kids, right? Before I could answer, she said: "I know your mom, she is so nice. Once a month I see her at one of our Tupperware parties. And that reminds me, I am going to have an Avon party next week, so I need to let your mom know". Then before I could say anything, she blurted out: "I am one of the top Avon producers in the whole area, and if things go as planned, I should win a pink Cadillac within the next two years". Man, I'm thinking to myself that this lady is a real air head that certainly never shuts up. No wonder Ralph is a loser.

After she takes another deep breath, she asks me if she can tell Ralph anything. Just as I start to answer she says: "Oh by the way, what is your name". Right away I replied: "Dave, and I was just going to ask Ralph how he likes being our neighborhood paper boy". "Oh, my goodness, he absolutely hates it. My husband Tony and I promised him we would pay for half the cost of a car if he paid the other half. It's been a nightmare. Customer complaints never stop. He seldom ever gets a day off. And when he goes house to house every month to collect his money, people are always stiffing him, so my husband ends up paying for most of the papers. He has enough money for his half of the car and has been trying to quit for two months, but his uncle John, who got him the job, and who is also his manager, can't find anyone that will take the job". Another deep breath and she's off to the races again. "Oh my goodness Dave, would you be interested in the job"? She took a quick pause to collect herself, realizing what she had just said, then did a quick recovery, and then said: “Honey, it’s really not as bad as I just described. There is a lot of prestige in being the neighborhood paperboy, and probably a great career path for the right person. We are so proud of Ralph, it’s just that this particular job doesn’t fit his personality and career interests. He is not a real people person, and manual labor is not his thing. You on the other hand, seem to be pretty outgoing, and your husky build would be a real plus”. Ya, right, my plus, plus size is a real plus! There’s another dig on my Pugsly look. At least she didn’t take a shot at my black glasses. She is, however, pretty good at blowing smoke up my posterior apex, as far as changing the job description. I’ll give her that one!

“Well, I might be interested. What would be a good time to come back and talk to Ralph”? I said. “Just come on in and I will give you some milk and chocolate covered donuts while I get him up. I’m sure he won’t mind whatsoever.”

Here we are sitting at the much too familiar dinner table again after a blockbuster morning that resulted in me landing my very first real job. Mom got a break tonight, since Dad stopped on the way home from work and got Chinese takeout. He got the usual, which was chicken fried rice without the chicken. Including the chicken was way too expensive. “Everybody, your attention please, I have a big announcement to make” I said. “Effective this coming Saturday, I am officially the new neighborhood paperboy. Mom smiled, and dad started choking on a small piece of fried egg that took the place of the expensive chicken. He looked at me coughing and said: “You have got to be kidding”. “No Dad, I am not kidding. I am dead serious about getting my own horse, and I told you I would figure out a way to get a job to make it happen”. Mom intervened and said: “So tell us the details, we had no idea you were trying to become a paperboy. I thought you had to be 16 years old. And your awfully small height-wise aren’t you”? (Couldn’t she have just said I was just awfully small which would imply both height and weight, and left it at that? My own Mother taking a cheap shot-just plain pathetic.).

Mom leaned back in her chair and lit a cigarette, and Dad got a toothpick and started grooming his teeth. 'Ok, give us the scoop" he said. "After your episode with the newspaper I decided to go to Ralph's house this morning to see if there was an opportunity to get a job as a paperboy. I first spoke to his mom, who is a real piece of work by the way. She spilled the beans that basically Ralph didn't want the job anymore, and that his uncle, who just happens to be his boss at the Denver Post, was having a hard time finding a replacement. Then she got Ralph out of bed, and they got Uncle John on the phone, and he hired me right on the spot. He said my age was not an issue as long as I get less complaints than Ralph, which shouldn't be very hard to do. Ralph gave me his paper bike, dual paper carrying bags, and front and back walking bags. I am going to work with him until Saturday, learning the ropes, and officially take over Saturday afternoon". After fielding detailed questions about the job that I couldn't answer quite yet, Mom said: "Congratulations, we are glad you took the initiative to seek out and land a job, even though it seems a little suspect since it sounds like they couldn't find anyone else to take it". Then Dad said: "Just like we discussed before, make sure it doesn't interfere with school and sports. And oh, by the way, don't wake me up on Sunday mornings to help you fold papers and deliver them out of the back of my station wagon". I replied: "Not a problem Pops, are you interested in buying a used lawn mower and edging clippers by any chance"?

“Don’t do what they expect, do what you dream”

Unknown

Part 2-A Journey From City Slicker to Beat Up City Slicker

Chapter 6 Ginger, and Another Step Closer (6th grade, 1965)

It's mid-summer and I have my paper route routine pretty well figured out. The key was to deliver the papers on time, placing them next to the door or inside the screen door if they had one. This resulted in good tips from the non-cheapskate customers. Also, to maximize profits from receiving good tips, it was imperative that I did my monthly "Collect for the Post" at the dinner time hour because that's when the man of the house was at home, and he usually controlled the household finances. Ralph made the big mistake, that is when he got the energy to do it, of trying to collect during a weekday afternoon and the wife wouldn't have any money to pay him, so he would give up coming back after a few tries. The other advantage of showing up during dinner time, would be that most families would invite you inside, and you could socialize and catch up on things while the man of the house was getting cash, or writing out a check. Sometimes I would get invited to join them for dinner and get a reprieve from Mom's cooking, which was a real treat. In fact, I got to know just about all my customers so well, I was almost part of the family. Over time, I strategically dropped the fact that I was saving to buy my own horse, and they would occasionally ask how the savings fund was progressing, sometimes feeling obligated to throw in a little extra tip. In retrospect, my paper business was a great learning experience as far as building a good work ethic and people person skills. Many years later my wife Daphne would describe my people person skills as “Dave, the Ultimate Salesman”, not meant to be taken as a real compliment, by the way. And to keep Dad happy, I had a staff of a few neighborhood buddies, including my little brother Jim, that would help me out on nights when I had baseball, or other pressing obligations that required my participation, usually per Dad’s request.

“Hi Bobby, collect for the post “I said: “Oh, hi Dave, I am really sorry but I had to use the money Mom left for you, so I could buy some gas. She forgot to pay me my allowance this week. She should be home from visiting her horse by around 8:00 if ya want to come back”. I said: “No problem, I can do that, see ya later”. What, her horse? Of course, I will come back. I never knew his mom had a horse, mainly because I never really talked with her before. She is never home so she always leaves my money on a table next to the front door for Bobby to pay me, which usually includes a nice tip.

Bobby is an interesting, not so typical High School kid. He makes Ralph look like a world class work horse. His Mom, Pat is a single mom who is a high-powered real estate sales lady. She drives a fancy Mercedes and is hated by most all the neighborhood mothers. She is very attractive, makes a lot of money, and most people are plain scared of her powerful personality. Not your typical housewife of the 60’s generation. She scared Bobby’s dad off years ago, leaving Bobby to pretty much raise himself, with the assistance of Mom’s hefty pocketbook. He was always in trouble, with Mom doing whatever it took to bail him out.

“Hi Ms. Richards, my name is Dave Rossiter. I am your paperboy, and it sure is a pleasure to finally meet you”, I said: “Nice to meet you Dave, just call me Pat. You’re here kind of late. Are you here for your money, or are you looking to buy a house”?, she said joking. “Ya, I was here earlier, and Bobby said he had to use the money for gas since you forgot to give him his allowance this week, and he just happened to mention that you would be home at 8:00 after going to see your horse. I would sure like to visit with you about your horse if you have a minute”, I said. “Sure, come on in and let’s sit down at the kitchen table, and talk about horses while we knock back an ice-cold Coca Cola” she said. I walked in the door thinking what a treat a genuine, non-Shasta cola will be in this truly upper-class household!

“Well Mrs. Richards, I mean Pat, it’s a well-known fact among most of my paper customers, that I am working toward buying my own horse within the next year or so. I have always wanted to be a cowboy and own my own horse. In the meantime, I would welcome any opportunity to be around a horse to learn everything I can before I own one of my own. So, when I heard you have a horse, I thought I would ask if you needed any help taking care of it.”

She looked at me while taking another swig of her coke and said: “No, I sure don’t need any help”. Then she got up and walked into the other room to get her purse to pay me. She walked back in, laid the money in front of me, and said: “Anything else I can help you with young man”? I’m thinking to myself that this lady really is a bulldog, but at least she gave me another nice tip. As I stood up to leave, I said, “Nope, that was it. Thanks for the money and coke. It was very nice chatting with you.” As I started to leave, she looked at me and said: “Sit back down Cowboy, never take no for an answer.

“First off, when you are trying to sell something to someone, never ask a question they can just say no to. Instead, ask me about my horse”. “Okay”, I said: Pat, Bobby told me you have a horse, can you tell me its name and what you do with it”? “I would be happy to she said chuckling. Her name is Ginger, and she is a 15-year-old Quarter Horse mare that I got several years ago when my sister passed away. I offered to take her from my brother-in-law and promised him I would always take care of her. I thought Bobby would get interested in her, but that fizzled out after a month or so”. So, I chuckled, and said: “So if Bobby doesn’t do anything with her, tell me what you or anyone else does with her”? “Now you’re catching on” she said. She proceeded to tell me:

“I board her at a place that turns her out once a day, and feeds, cleans and takes care of her. I don’t ride, but I go see her when I get stressed out, just to groom her and chill with her. She is the only living being, human, or animal that relaxes and calms me down after a long day dealing with clients. Basically, I would rather be around her instead of most people, present company excluded of course.”

“Sounds like you really like Ginger”. I said. “It’s a real shame that nobody rides or exercises her, since you don’t have time, and Bobby is nowhere to be found. If you were to show me what to do, I can exercise, and ride her a few times a week free of charge. How’s that sound to you Pat”? (This sales language stuff really works. I think I just asked to close the sale). Pat smiled and said: “Done deal” and shook my hand. As I was leaving, I thought to myself, another step closer!

I guess Pat took a liking to me because of my salesmanship, and the fact that I would spend time exercising Ginger for free. So much so, that she hired Millie to give me lessons once a week. Millie was about 75 years old, and the wife of the stable manager. She was too old to ride but I learned some basic horsemanship from her, as well as how to care for a horse, tack them up, and lope around the arena without falling off. By the end of the summer, I thought I had learned enough from Millie to ensure that I was ready to handle and care for my own horse. My time with Millie and Ginger was the second to the last piece of the puzzle towards getting my own horse. The last piece was the money. I figured I would have saved enough to buy a horse for $150 before my 13th birthday on December 16th, so I now needed to put a plan into action!

“Ok, Millie, Ginger is all tacked up and ready to go. What are we going to work on today”? I said. “Well, now that you are starting to get a better seat, I think you are ready to begin working on the lope. We are lucky that Ginger is so well trained, and such an excellent horse to teach you how to ride, since you honestly don’t know a whole lot. Basically, Ginger is a valuable horse because she is a good teacher and babysitter. I have been trying to buy her to use as one of my lesson horses, but Pat said she would never sell her”, she said. Then she walked over to me and said: "You know Dave, you are very lucky that Pat took a liking to you, and that she lets you ride Ginger. There are not many people she trusts with this horse, and now that I think about it, not many people she even likes, for that matter". I felt like asking her if she was among the many women that didn't like Pat, but it was really none of my business. However, the more I was around her, I kind of figured out that she tolerated Pat for strictly monetary reasons.

It's Thanksgiving Day 1965, and we are all sitting around the dining room table ready to dig into what looks to be an unburned feast of delicious food. A very rare occurrence in the Rossiter household, that is normally characterized as being well overdone to say the least. The day started out with me delivering papers in the morning since it was a holiday, No watching the traditional Macy's Day Parade for a working kid. I finished just in time before a big snowstorm hit which rendered everybody confined to the house all day watching dad scream and yell at College Football on the Radiation Box.

Dad starts with the standard blessing of "Bless Us Oh Lord for These I etc., etc., etc.," then ends with: "And bless our soldiers who are spending this Thanksgiving in Vietnam risking their lives in the spirit of preserving democracy and human rights, Amen". Dad, being a World War 2 vet and winner of two purple hearts, (not sure if winner is the right word, but whatever), was always thinking about people in the military, and the sacrifices they make. At least he wasn't having to refer to a war with Russia that luckily, never materialized.

Since it was a holiday, and we were all in the official dining room, we were spared the usual around the table discussion of the day's happenings. Probably a good thing, since nothing really happened other than watching Dad coach College Football from our living room. Everybody finishes and gets up to help clear the table and Dad says: "Hey Roy, Mom and I want to talk with you this evening after the other kids go to bed. Since you don't have to go to school tomorrow, we will let you stay up past your bedtime since you're the oldest". I'm thinking, oh no, they are going to read me the right act about how I am not holding up my end of the bargain on our horse compromise. I guess I am guilty of spending a lot of time between my paper route and working with Ginger. At least I played baseball all summer, even though I quit fall football, and probably won't be able to do the bowling league this winter. But my grades in school really aren't all that bad, so that's a positive. I just as well spring my timing for buying a horse on him while we're at it and get it over with. As I look out the window watching the snow come down, I think to myself that if it was the end of the month, I could kill some time "Collecting for the Post" until the big showdown tonight. It would be a great evening to make the rounds since everyone will be home at Thanksgiving. Oh well, I guess I will just go to my room and look at my baseball cards. As I am going through my cards the thought hit me that Millie sure took a different approach than the fat guy did with horses. She was good with Ginger as far as being calm and confident, but always following through when she asked her to do something. That's for sure the approach I am going to take with my new horse. Ginger and Millie sure taught me a lot.

Here it comes! "Ok Roy," said my dad, "Your Mom and I want to talk to you about where you are at on this whole horse thing. She has pretty much convinced me to lighten up on you as far as you're doing the things, I want you to do" he continued. "With that said, we are impressed with how you took the initiative to get a real job and stick with it at your age. "And don't let this go to your head, but I am also surprised how you found a way to learn about horses, basically for free". I am thinking to myself that there must be some sort of a catch here, or Mom really did transform Dad's thinking. "So, what's the bottom line here Dad, and what did Mom say to change your mind"? I said. "Well Roy, here's our thinking" he said. I know your almost 13, and you won't be eligible for the draft until your 18. Who knows how long this Vietnam thing will last, but if it's still going on when you turn 18, your headed to Vietnam. The only way that I would allow you to be a draft dodger is to be in college, which at least for now is a valid way to avoid the draft. And the only way your going to college is if you keep good grades and work to save money for college, since we can't afford to send you. So, the bottom line is keep getting good grades, make money, save for college, and buy your horse. If you can swing that, I will back off on all the sports stuff".

Truth be known, Dad was so military and patriotic he probably would have rather seen me go fight for our country. This approach was definitely Mom driving the bus. Turns out she was on to something. In January 1973 the Vietnam War ended with the U.S. suffering over 58,000 casualties. In 1969 the U.S. changed the draft to a lottery system, whereby eligible men 18 years or older were drawn each year by their birthdate. The last year of the lottery was August 1971 and the first year I was eligible. I was 19 and had just graduated from High School. My lottery number was 128, but luckily, they only drafted up to number 95 that year. Dodged a bullet there since I was planning on starting college at Colorado State University, but didn't get in until the fall of 1973, (more on that later) . Anyway, true to form, Bobby Richards was a classic draft dodger. He was drafted at the height of the war, and since he was too lazy to go to college, Pat ended up sending him to Canada to join over 40,000 others who fled to Canada to avoid the draft during the Vietnam war.

"Thanks Mom and Dad" I said. "I won't let you down. As far as my horse, I have enough saved to buy one before my birthday for around $150. I will keep the paper route going to pay for boarding the horse, and to start saving for college. You guys are the best". I'm thinking to myself that it's interesting how the older I get, the smarter my parents seem to get. Funny how that works.

The search for Equus has begun!

Chapter 7 A Dream Come True-Turns into Black and Blue

“Hi Millie, how was your Thanksgiving”? I said. “It was ok, I guess, same old story: worthless and lazy relatives, just a different year, different turkey. As usual I did all the work while everybody else sat on their oversized butts watching TV. Glad it’s over, how about you Dave”. “It was great since I got the green light from my parents to buy a horse. My dream of having my horse is finally going to happen. My plan is to find a cheap place to board, buy tack and supplies, and then find and buy a horse before my birthday on December 16th.” “Sounds pretty ambitious since that’s only a few weeks away. My advice to you is to take your time to find a horse that is a been there done that type. No such thing as a bombproof horse, but that’s just what you need, similar to Ginger. They are hard to find, but it’s well worth taking your time to find one, since your still green when it comes to horses. As the old saying goes, Green Horse with Green Rider equals Black and Blue Rider” she said laughing. “If you need any help finding tack and a horse, just let me know. I am happy to help you” she said. “Thanks Millie, I really appreciate all you have done for me.”

As I am riding my bike up the steep hill on Sheridan Avenue towards home, I noticed that I wasn't breathing like an old Hoover vacuum cleaner anymore. Between packing papers every day and riding eight miles several times a week to see Ginger I realized that I had not only lost all my excess weight, but also gotten into pretty good shape. The days of wearing size husky jeans from Sell Low were finally behind me. And my lazy right eye also got into shape, and I was able to shed the black glasses. Via Con Dios Pusglsy. As I crest the hill like a not yet born, Lance Armstrong, I am thinking to myself that I better take Millie's advice, and really spend the time to find a horse like Ginger. I probably won't meet my December 16 target, but that's ok. I have waited this long, so what's a few extra weeks. I'm sure mom and dad won't care.

After finishing my paper route that afternoon it was starting to get dark as I walked in the house. Since it was the day after Thanksgiving, dad got home early but was nowhere to be seen as I strolled through the house. "Hi mom" I said. "Where's dad at?" "He is in the upstairs bathroom using the bathtub to make his Home Brew Beer, and you know what that means" she said. We all knew that when dad was mixing his secret ingredients for his homemade beer, he was not to be disturbed. He was well known around his circle of buddies to brew some of the best beer imaginable. In fact, he would only pull out his private stock for visitors if they were very special. I guess he considered our church priest and three nuns special when he had them over one night and they all got sloshed. (Whatever it takes to get to the kingdom of heaven, I guess). Now that I think about it, he was very environmentally conscious for those times, as he would use the same beer bottles repeatedly for each new batch. He even had a state-of-the-art bottle cap machine.

"What do you want dad for?" said mom. "Oh, I just need to give you guys an update on the horse, since I talked with Millie this afternoon". "What a coincidence" she replied. "Dad has some great news on a horse that he wants to talk to you about. We can talk over dinner tonight. That just reminded me, I need to take the Swanson TV dinners out of the freezer". "That got me thinking of two things. Number one, turkey TV dinners were horrible, but a definite upgrade to the usual fish fare on a Friday night. And number two, what on earth could the great news on a horse be, coming from dad?"

Tonight, dad changed up the blessing to add some humor to set the tone for a fine Swanson's dinner. "Four potatoes for the five of us, thank god there's no more of us, Amen. Got some great news for ya Roy" he continued. I was talking to my buddy Frank Webster at work and told him you were looking for a horse. Eileen in the typing pool overheard us talking and mentioned she had a horse for sale. Seems her husband just left her, and she can't afford horses anymore, so she sold all of them off except for one. It's a girl horse about 5 years old, brown color, and according to Eileen, a very smart horse. And it gets even better. I paid her fifty bucks for the horse, and she said she can deliver it for free next Saturday. I just saved you a hundred buckaroos, so you can pay me back my fifty, use fifty for tack and supplies, and put the other fifty in your college fund. She said she has never been ridden before, but I figure with all your experience with Ginger you should have no problem busting her, or whatever term you horse folks use".

Dad was so excited that he found a horse and saved me a pile of money in the process, I just couldn't burst his bubble by telling him what Millie said. "Boy dad, I really don't know what to say other than thanks for all of your help, and by the way, my green grape jello next to my mashed potatoes is starting to turn black and blue." Mom looked over at me kind of puzzled and said: "What did you want to tell us about a horse and Millie"? I am never at a loss for words, so I replied: "Oh, she just told me good luck finding a horse, and that she really enjoyed Thanksgiving with all her fantastic relatives who are so energetic and always willing to lend a hand preparing the dinner. I just can't wait to tell Millie and all my paper customers that I finally got a horse".

Here I am on the next Saturday December 3rd huddled up next to a blazing pot belly stove in the official wild bunch clubhouse at the Hiwan Ranch on the Bear Creek River. It's snowing and twenty degrees outside. Several of the members of the wild bunch who had just finished their routine Saturday afternoon ride. are now passing the bottle around before going home to their irate wives, after being gone all day drinking and playing cowboy. "Okay everybody" said Russ, who is the barn manager. Russ is an ex-jockey, about 60 years old and walks with a crippled up left leg from a racehorse accident. As he was waiting for everyone to stop talking and give him the dirt floor, he pulled out a paper, then a pouch of tobacco, sprinkled tobacco on the paper, licked the paper, rolled it up perfectly, put it in his mouth, then lit it right up. Not only had I never seen someone roll their own cigarette before, but to do it so fast was just downright impressive.

"I want to introduce our new boarder, Dave Rossiter, and his new horse Starfire. He went on to say "We all were pretty entertained this afternoon watching the lady try to get her to back out of that fancy two horse trailer. But I think I speak for all of us in stating that Starfire is one motley looking animal with some major behavioral issues". "And what really topped it off is when she bit Dave on the arm while he led her to the stall." Everybody started laughing and passed the bottle around again. Then Russ said: "Don't take it personal kid. If you're going to hang around this place you have to be man enough to accept our joking around, and in your case, the reality of your horse situation. In all seriousness, welcome to the ranch and we are all here to lend you a hand, not if, but when you need help with that fine steed."

"Hi Dave, my name is Marv. That lady must have seen you coming from a mile away. My advice is a shot to the head behind the barn. I have a pistol in my pickup you can borrow" More laughter ensued as they passed the bottle around again. "Pleased to meet you Dan, my name is Jim Halbert, everybody just calls me Halbert. A nice two by four between the ears will straighten her right out, it sure worked with my horse" slurring his words and calling me by the wrong name. "Hi Dave, I am Casper Hoppess. You can just call me Hopp. "The good news is we can probably help fix the behavior issues, but you're stuck with the confirmation and pathetic looks of that poor animal. She might bring fifty bucks, if you sell her to Pres to go to the killers. That's probably your best option". Who is Pres, and what the heck are the killers? I thought to myself. "Ok, that's about enough abuse for Dave's first day. It's going to be getting dark soon, so anybody want to give Dave a ride home since he rode his bike here. " said Russ. Ride with one of these drunks? No way, I will take my chances in the dark and freezing elements. “Oh no worries, I will be fine riding my bike home, it’s only a couple of miles, and it’s not snowing that hard yet. Nice meeting everybody, and thanks for the advice”. I walked through the barn to say goodnight to Starfire, before heading home, thinking to myself: Not what I had expected on the first day of finally owning my own horse. I don’t think I want any of these guys helping me with Starfire since their advice is to either shoot her, send her to the killers, which I just now figured out, or use a two by four between the ears. Sounds like fat guy horsemanship to me!

I walked in the door as everyone was seated at the table celebrating sister Pam’s twelfth birthday. “How’s your new horse Roy?”, said dad. “She is a real dandy dad; you really outdid yourself on this one. Sell Low couldn’t even come close to this level of a smoking deal” I said, while walking downstairs, to wash my hands, and my bloody black and blue arm.

Chapter 8-The Big Break-Meeting a Real Cowboy

My 13th birthday came and went without much fanfare. Since I couldn’t afford a saddle yet, I was mainly working with Starfire to lead, without her leading me, and picking up her feet without her reaching around to bite me. I actually think the wild bunch quit drinking so much because they were so entertained watching the Dave and Starfire comedy show. I was too embarrassed to ask Millie for help, and even though they offered to help, I steered clear of the Wild Bunch, on account of their fat guy horsemanship methods.

Christmas morning finally arrived and my belief in Santa Clause was shattered, (not entirely true, as I had been getting somewhat suspicious over the last couple of Christmases), when I saw Bobby Richard’s saddle under our tree. I couldn’t believe my eyes and pretended that Santa really did come through so I wouldn’t ruin it for Pam and Jim. “Gee Mom and Dad how did Santa know where to find a saddle. It wasn’t even in the Montgomery Ward catalog.” Both mom and dad winked at me. Then I reminded myself that dad really is softening up and giving into my horsey aspirations. What a great Christmas present.

Starfire had never been ridden or had a saddle on, for that matter. I spent the next month getting her desensitized to it, to where she wouldn't buck every time it was on her back. Then I spent another month leading her around in the arena and pasture preparing to eventually get on and start riding her. It was late February, snow on the ground, and just starting to get dark. I had not been to the east end of the 100-acre pasture, so I led Starfire over in that direction and noticed a neighbor's house and barn with about fifty horses in one of the pastures. There was a cowboy looking guy riding a black and white paint horse in the arena along with another guy wearing a baseball cap smoking a cigar and riding a big buckskin horse. They waved to me, and just as I raised my hand to wave back, a jackrabbit jumped out of a nearby bush. Starfire took off in a terror, and I held on to the lead rope for dear life until I finally let go after getting drug for what seemed eternity. Crippled up, with my knees and elbow killing me, and all scraped up, I went to catch Starfire who was long gone, and packing my Christmas issue saddle. I looked back to see if the two guys saw this fiasco unfold, and sure enough, they had. There was a gate from their arena into the Hiwan pasture, that they had already opened, and gone through, as they were in hot pursuit of Starfire at a full gallop. It was one impressive sight watching what looked to be some real cowboys catching up to Starfire. The guy on the paint reached over at top speed to grab the lead rope and dally it around his saddle horn. Starfire pulled back to escape but hit a brick wall when the paint didn't flinch, dragging her along like she wasn't even there. I was thinking, that's probably the first time in her life she hasn't gotten her way. Maybe there is a place for getting tough every now and then when training horses? These cowboys got more done with her in five minutes than I had in two months.

"Here's your horse kid" said the cowboy on the paint horse as he handed me the lead rope. "My name is Preston, and you can just call me Pres. And this big fella here on the buckskin, is Ken, we call him K.J for short," he said. I replied, "Nice meeting you guys, and thanks for retrieving my horse. My name is Dave, and you can just call me Dave for short". "Looks like you have your hands full with this fine-looking animal" said K.J. I was hurting pretty bad and didn't feel like engaging in another discussion about this less than desirable horse, so I just said: "That's an understatement". I then tried to start the long walk back to the barn but could barely walk. "We would pony your horse and give you a ride back to the Hiwan barn, but we don't get along with Russ and the Wild Bunch. Were not welcome on this property. Since your all stove up, why don't you jump up behind me if you can. I will take you and your horse to my place, and my wife Lorretta can patch you up and you can turn your horse out in one of my pastures until your able to come back and get her," said Pres. "Sounds good" I said, as I gritted by teeth and swung up behind Pres. As we rode off into the already set, sunset, aka, pitch dark, I am thinking to myself that this may be the big break in my horse training journey, I had been waiting for: to meet up with a real cowboy, the possibilities might be endless!

Chapter 9-A Wake-up Call and Sunday Night Story Telling

Here I am sitting at the kitchen table with my family again, but this time it's almost 57 years after that cold dark night in Colorado when cowboy Pres, and K.J saved the day when Starfire drug me and ran off with my new saddle on. The family and kitchen are also different, compared to back then. I am now sitting at the table in our Gilbert Arizona ranch house, with my wife Daphne, the love of my life, and bride of 38 years, daughter Kelli, who is 34 and married to her husband Mark who together have two fine daughters. Tenley is in second grade, and Everly is in pre- kindergarten. And then there's my son Max who is 32, and has a daughter named Oakley, also a pre-kindergarten scholar.

Daphne said: " It's sure nice that we can revive our Sunday night ritual of family dinner together, now that Covid is pretty much behind us, and things are getting back to normal. I take that back; I mean somewhat normal. Living the past two years with people around us sick or dying, and basically a wholesale change in how people including all of us, led our daily lives, is sure a wake-up call". I was thinking to myself that there are some positives that came out of the Covid era. Even though Daphne's cooking is way better than my moms was, she hates cooking. Without in-person dining, restaurants survived by featuring the ultimate in-home delivery services. Now, with Covid in the rear-view mirror, Daphne is addicted, and has become a master at ordering dinner on her cell phone. Home cooking is even more rare, than it used to be, as are in person restaurant visits. Plus, Covid also gave rise to home delivery from Supermarkets. Simply order what you want on the store app, and the store picks out your groceries and delivers them to your front door.

"I'll say it's a wake-up call", said Kelli. I think people got a dose of reality seeing that life can be gone in a flash, and you better start living your life with different priorities since you might not be here tomorrow. Look at all the people who have quit their jobs, (the great resignation) or are requiring that their employer give them more flexibility in the workplace. People got used to working from home, and they don't want to return to the same old grind and long commute to the office. A lot of my friends, as well as Mark and Max, are still able to work from home, full or part-time, and have more flexible work hours and time off as well."

"Your kind of quiet Max. Got anything you want to add to this conversation"? I said. "Funny you should ask dad. I have been delegated to be the spokesman for me and the rest of our family." "That's great Max, good choice by the other family members, (even though it's only mom, Kelli, and Mark). You're probably the best orator of the bunch. Just what did you have in mind to orate about?" I said. "Before I begin, does anyone need their drink refilled? Another Diet Dr. Pepper Mark? Another Coors Light dad? Another bathroom break Kelli or mom? No, we are all good to go, was the collective response.

Max stood up at the head of the table and began by saying: "Let me first mention an article that I ran across and shared with Kelli and Mom. It talks about a lady in Australia that worked for several years as a Hospice Nurse, caring for patients in the last days of their lives. She recorded their epiphanies and she put her observations into a book called The Top Five Regrets of the Dying. None of us read the book, but the 5 regrets surprisingly don't have anything to do with wealth, or material things. We all thought those would be at the top of the list. Interestingly enough, the top five were: 1) I wish I'd had the courage to live a life true to myself, not the life others expected of me. 2) I wished I had not worked so hard. 3) I wish I had the courage to express my feelings. 4) I wish I had stayed in touch with my friends. and 5) I wish I had let myself be happier. We compared notes and agreed that all of them were pretty self-explanatory except for: I wish I had the courage to express my feelings. We dug a little deeper and they went on to explain that many people suppressed their feelings in order to keep peace with others. As a result, they settled for a mediocre existence and never became who they were truly capable of becoming".

"Can I interrupt you for a minute"? I said. "Sure, said Max, what is it?" Not sure where you're going with this, but you and Kelli are in your early thirties. I can understand why mom might be thinking about regrets in life, since she is at a later stage in life, compared to you guys. But what prompted you kids to take an interest in this stuff anyway"? "Good question, so please let me continue" he said.

"Me, mom, Mark, and Kelli got to talking one day about how good we have it in life compared to most people. Actually, very similar to how you described your situation in one of your stories where you talked about your family culture early in life. Anyway, the ramifications of living in the Covid era got us asking ourselves if we really are living the best life possible. Then we got to talking about you. Don't let this go to your head, but you seem to have things pretty well figured out. Based on the many stories you have told us as well as seeing you in action firsthand, it seemed to us that you have lived a cool life so far, almost 70 years and counting. You're a great father/husband, you don't care what other people think of you, you always seem happy because you're doing what you want to do, you don't have a temper, and it seems like everyone you meet becomes your friend. And basically, you seem to be your best life leader". "Ok, I think he gets the picture, now let me mention some of his not so desirable traits, just kidding," said mom.

“With that said, before Covid hit you were taking us through your equine guided leadership story. It was fun to hear about your early years and realizing your dream of owning your own horse. Oh, and by the way, you really left us hanging, not knowing what happened after you rode over to Pres’s house to get patched up. But honestly, what we are really interested in is hearing about the rest of your journey and how horses changed your life by, as you described it, teaching you how to live a lifetime”. I think before Covid, we enjoyed the story telling, but where you were taking us was not yet resonating. Now, post Covid we are in a much better mindset to listen to what you have to say. Since it obviously is working for you, it is our hope that it will prove to be life changing for all of us as well.”

“Boy, I am both flattered and dumbfounded to say the least”, I said. I never expected this. You can add this request to the evolution of the restaurant and supermarket home deliveries as some of the few positives that came out of Covid”. They all looked at each other wondering where that statement came from. “So how do you want to proceed?” “Well,” said Kelli, since we are getting back together every Sunday night for family dinner again, why don’t we all agree that you will use about 30 minutes during dinner for a story telling session. How’s that sound dad?” “Book it guys”, I said. See everybody next Sunday, when I will begin by finishing the story on going to Pres’s house. Oh, and one last thing. Let’s all give Max a nice round of applause for the fine presentation.” “Thanks everybody” said Max, as he raised his glass of water to give a toast, and said: “Here’s to having no regrets!

Part 3- A Journey from City Slicker to Cowboy to Horseman

Sunday #1 A Cowboy and Real Hand (Oct 30)

Well, everybody, here we are on the first Sunday night of our journey in storytelling. So, before we get started, what's new with everybody? "Not much", said Kelli. We obviously spent most of the day watching you and Max at the race, so after dinner, we need to get the girls ready for Halloween tomorrow night at our house. "How are you and Max feeling after your Ironman 70.3 race today in Tempe" said Daphne. "It was a piece of cake. I'm a little tired, but I had a great race and felt great. "Speak for yourself Max", I said. "Even though I finished second in my, not so deep 70-74 age group, I ended up in the medical tent with bad leg cramps. Now I feel like I have been rode hard and put up wet". "Is that some of your cowboy lingo we will be learning about from these Sunday night sessions"? said Mom with a smirk on her face. "Funny you should say that dear. That's exactly where I am going tonight, talking about becoming a cowboy", I said.

I waited in front of Pres's front door while he unsaddled his paint horse. I was freezing and my left leg was throbbing from being drug like a water skier without water across the pasture by a runaway Starfire. "Dave, this is my wife Loretta", said Pres. "He got kind of banged up tonight, so could you patch him up, and I will give him a ride home". "Well, that should do it," said Loretta. "Those are some nasty scrapes, so make sure you keep them clean, and don't let them get infected". Pres walked back in the room and said, "You sure don't seem to know your way around horses, so how did you end up with that bronc at Hiwan Ranch?" I told them the whole story about how Starfire is my first horse, and how I am a city kid, but my dream has always been to be a cowboy. "Well, our son Mike is in the service, and just shipped out to Germany. I need help, so if you are really serious about becoming a cowboy, and a real hand, you can go to work for me, but it's going to be a lot of hard work and dedication. Talk to your folks and maybe we can work something out". "I will get back to you tomorrow when I come back to pick up Starfire", I said, as I slid out of his truck and limped towards our front door. I'm thinking to myself that this is really the opportunity I had been waiting for. Mom and dad won't care since it's a real job. The big problem is going to be finding an unsuspecting sucker to take over my paper route. Luckily, I have acquired some valuable salesmanship skills!!!!

It's 11:30 at night and I am loading eight head of horses into Pres's six horse gooseneck trailer at the sale barn in Fort Morgan Colorado. After riding horses in the sale ring that night I am pretty worn out, but not quite as tired as Pres who is passed out in the front seat of the truck from a non-contagious case of exhaustion and Jack Daniels. After just three months of working for Pres, I am well on the road to becoming a cowboy, and an accomplished driver at 13 years old. It's become very clear that when Mike left for Germany, Pres was not only losing a ranch hand, but a private chauffeur as well. That's ok, though, good cowboys do whatever it takes to get the job done.

About halfway home, I pulled over to the side of the road with red lights flashing behind me. I looked over and Pres was wide awake, sitting up straight as could be, and said, "Let me do the talking". I rolled down my window and the highway patrolman said: "Can I see your license sir, I mean kid"? I looked over at Pres who said: "Is that you Ben"? "Oh, no, is that you Pres, he said. "Ya, it's me. Mike shipped out to Germany, and I am grooming his replacement". "Come on Pres, I cut you a lot of slack over the years when Mike was too young to drive, but this kid can barely see over the dashboard". "I know" said Pres, "but in my current condition he is a much safer driver than I am. Can ya just cut me some slack, just this one time"? "There have been way too many "just this one time" times over the years Pres. Next time I just may have to take you in to the station. But tonight, it's late, I'm tired, and my shift ends in 10 minutes. So kid, get these horses home safe, and this fugitive out of my sight. Good to see you Pres, and tell Loretta I said hello". Pres leaned back in his seat, tipped his hat over his eyes, and said: "That takes care of that, just wake me up when we get home and you have all the horses unloaded, fed, and watered." I guess he wasn't kidding when he said it would be a lot of hard work and dedication. He did fail to mention, however, that it entailed breaking the law from time to time.

As time went on, I came to appreciate how much effort and thought Pres was investing in me. He was a good person, and cowboy, who was proud of how he could get things done with horses, and especially his ability to make a living buying and selling horses. He went to great lengths to bestow these qualities on me. Looking back over my eight years, on and off tenure working for Pres, it was almost like attending "The Pres 's School of Get ER Done Horsemanship." His business model was buying horses as cheaply as possible, and turning them over for a profit, in as short amount of time possible. Horses were merely a commodity. The handling and riding techniques I learned were in the category of force, domination, intimidation, and coercion. Sort of like a master-slave kind of relationship. At the time, these methods were mainstream, from my point of view, because I didn't know any other way of interacting with horses. All the cowboys, including Pres, that I encountered or worked with, were revered for using these techniques to perfection, (with several exceptions, which I will discuss later), so why would I even think of questioning them.

From day one, Professor Pres put me on the fast track. He drove me out to his big pasture in his truck and trailer and told me to spend the first week practicing driving between cones and backing up. The second week he taught me everything about saddles and tack, and how to tack up horses, (his way, not Millie's way by the way!). The third week I spent every afternoon riding his bucking barrel. The fourth week, he started putting me on all the new horses that came in for resale. But before I got on, I had to look at their mouth and tell Pres how old they were. Pres was an expert at mouthing horses, and all the sale barns used him as a ring steward to mouth horses and take bids. It took me a long time and lots of horses to get good at aging horses, but it was well worth it. Then he taught me how to sale prep horses, which more times than not, entailed using a scotch rope to hobble a hind leg, and using a twitch, so they would stand still for the loud clippers used to boot their legs, trim their face, ears, and wherever else was necessary. Once at the sale barn, I would check in our load of horses, and get them tacked up and situated. Then I would watch Pres and the other horse traders hone their skills at what was termed "Chute Trading". They were basically a den of thieves that would try to buy horses as they were being unloaded by unsuspecting sellers who had not yet checked them in. Knowing full well what they would bring in the sale ring, the strategy was to intimidate the horse owner into selling the horse to them cheap, and then turning around and reselling it in the sale a couple hours later for a quick profit. In fact, if the horse was lame, they would buy it for next to nothing promising the owner that it would not go to the killers. They would then drug the horse, so it showed sound in the sale ring insuring a nice profit in a record amount of time. I got a good education watching the traders buy horses and identify all the soundness problems they would point out. Everything from blindness, to lameness, splints, windpuffs, spavins, and many other things that were not many times not visible to the untrained eye.

Once the sale started, I would show our horses in the sale ring, already knowing from riding them at home what I could get away with on each horse. In between riding Pres's horses, I would ride a few horses for people that paid a fee to the sale barn to have their horse ridden. Pres had an arrangement with most of the sale barns where they paid him part of the riding fee on each horse I rode. Sometimes I would ride several horses a night for a sale barn, but still got the same hourly pay and free dinner at the sale barn café from Pres. Needless to say, they didn't have child labor laws in place back then. Usually there was a reason people paid extra to have someone else ride their horse. Even though it got pretty western at times, I just chalked it up to experience, and part of being a good cowboy.

By the time the sale was over, Pres was wearing down, so he would give me a signed check and I would go into the office to pay for the horses he bought, and collect a check for the horses he sold, my riding fee, and his ring steward pay. Paperwork in hand, I would collect the new horses, and take them to the loading chute area, where Pres would be waiting with the truck and trailer passing the bottle around with his horse trader cronies. Once I got the horses loaded, I would say goodnight to Pres as he started to nod off and begin the usually long drive home.

The next day, the process would start all over again with the addition of some extracurricular activities. Pres peddled a lot of horses by attracting buyers via advertising in the newspaper. He also had several other innovative practices which included gymkhanas. On weekends when there were no horse sales, Pres would have me tack up six horses and load them up in his trailer. He would then haul us to a local gymkhana, unload the horses, and go enter them in whatever events he thought each one would excel in. There was western pleasure, barrel racing, pole bending, keyhole race, rescue race, watermelon race, trail, and obstacle course, and whatever else the organizers could think of. I would ride the horses in the events, and if the horse placed, Pres would announce to the crowd that the horse was for sale during the ribbon presentation, (Purchase of the horse came with the ribbons). He also had special signs on his trailer and pickup announcing, "Horses Bought, Sold, and Traded". I got a lot of experience riding horses at these events while Pres had a lot of success selling and swapping horses. Even people not entered in an event would show up to just to see what horses Pres would show up with. Any purchase would come with a guarantee that if the horse didn't work out, he would replace it with one that would. This gave him another opportunity to make more money on the deal, which usually included a trade with boot money from the buyer. The epitome of a true Equine Entrepreneur! As a bonus for riding all these horses at gymkhanas, Pres and Loretta would take me and enter me in local Junior and Little Britches Rodeos in the bareback, bronc, and bull riding events. They truly loved the rodeo atmosphere and watching me build my rodeo skills, or lack thereof. Their hopes of one day watching me compete at the National Finals Rodeo in Oklahoma City never materialized, but that didn't stop them from going to watch the event for their annual vacation every year.

Having graduated from High School in the spring of 1971, I spent that summer working for Pres, as well as starting colts for the Peppy Blue Dot Ranch in Parker Colorado. Between working, and traveling to High School Rodeos throughout High School, my academic endeavors, or lack thereof, had taken a toll. In retrospect, I am really surprised I graduated from High School without really even studying. I unfortunately didn't hold up my end of the bargain with dad when it came to good grades, however at this point I had enough saved for the first semester at CSU, if, and when that might happen. Anyway, it came as no surprise that my lack luster grades and poor SAT score were just not up to snuff for getting accepted to Colorado State University. I was however, offered a rodeo scholarship to Lamar Community College, but I declined because I was determined to go to CSU, and eventually apply to get into vet school.

After receiving the third rejection letter from CSU, with the fall semester already in full swing, I decided to take a drive to Fort Collins and meet with the admissions office to plead my case. "Thanks for taking time to meet with me Mrs. Tucker" I said. "No problem, Dave. I must say you are very persistent. I think you are the first applicant I have dealt with that has been rejected three times over the course of several months and just doesn't seem to get the message. Your high school grades are very poor, and your SAT score is way below what is required", she said. "Most students in your situation can eventually get accepted if they go to a community college for a couple of years and get good grades. That's about your only option Dave". As she is talking, I had a flashback to that meeting with Pat Richards in her kitchen years ago- Never Take No for an Answer. "Mrs. Tucker, going to a community college is not an option. What is the minimum SAT score that you will accept?", I said. "Even if you retake the SAT exam, it is highly unlikely you could improve on your, how should I say this, somewhat embarrassing, no, quite embarrassing score of (I honestly don't remember what it was). You would need at least a 1200, and even with that, you would be on probation for the first semester. Take my advice, and just go to Lamar and get good grades" she replied. "Now we are getting somewhere", I said. "Can you give me a letter of acceptance under the condition that I score at least a 1200 on an SAT retake?" I said. "I have been doing this for over twenty years, and I am here to tell you that you're not going to improve your score that much unless you retake high school", she said only half joking. "But if a letter will make you happy, and get you on your way, so be it, I will type it up right now". So, she lit up a camel, slipped on her reading glasses with the librarian chain on them, loaded a sheet of paper in the Underwood, and started banging away. With the letter in hand, I headed back to Denver wondering how in the world I was going to ace the SAT!

“How did things go with the admissions office”? said Mom. “Well, I got a letter of acceptance under one, not so minor condition. I have to get a 1200 or better on the SAT. Problem is, I have no idea how that’s going to happen”. “Why don’t you talk to our neighbor Sammy about helping you out. He still tutors kids, just like he did for your sister Pam when she was in junior high trying to pass her math classes. Remember how Dad would try to help her and it always ended up in a big fight with Pam going to her room crying and slamming the door? Sammy not only saved her from your dad but successfully taught, you’re not so teachable sister, math. If he got your sister through math, getting you to score above 1200 should be a piece of cake. He was the first person to convince Pam that math was not stupid. That was quite a feat in itself. Anyway, the poor guy is a paralyzed from the neck down and has been bed ridden his whole life, but he sure knows his stuff, and is a great teacher. In fact, he has a real talent for connecting, and getting through to young people. I think you will really like him.” “Will do, thanks Mom”!

“Sammy, this is Pam Rossiter’s brother Dave,” said his mom, Ethyl. Sammy was lying in a fancy hospital bed in his bedroom that faced a big window so he could see out in the front yard and the street. Not knowing what to expect, I was somewhat astounded looking at this poor guy who had probably spent his whole life in this bedroom. His fingers were stubby and all puffy, and he had rosy, red cheeks. In a high-pitched voice, he said: “Come on over here Dave so I can see you” he said. I didn’t realize that he couldn’t even turn his head. “According to my mom, who spoke with your mom, you are looking to retake the SAT exam and score at least 1200 so you can enter CSU sometime in the near future. She also said you basically did the bare minimum to get through High School, and your SAT score was very poor. Do I have that right Dave?”, he said. “That’s correct sir”. “You can address me as Sammy, sir is my dad’s name, if and when we ever see him again. He left my mom and I years ago just in case you were wondering why it’s just the two of us. Ok, I can help you if you are willing to put in the time and effort. However, I will require you to adhere to a few conditions. First off, no feeling sorry for me. You will get used to looking at me and eventually come to realize that I actually lead a very happy, purposeful, and fulfilling life. Secondly, the only compensation I require is that for every minute I spend teaching you, you agree to spend equal time reading to me. I can't hold up a book and turn the pages. And oh yes, regarding books, you also must agree to return and pick up books for me at the library. And last, but not least, I am big on character and integrity. I don't see that as a problem with you as I watched you over the years delivering newspapers and how you handled yourself with my mom and our neighbors when you collected your money. As I say that, I am willing to overlook how you conned Ricky Walker into taking over your paper route." How the heck did he know anything about that. I would prefer the term salesmanship rather than conned, but whatever. "Nevertheless, I require honesty and truthfulness. In that regard I adhere to a culture of Stoicism, which you will learn a lot about when you are reading to me. To get a 1200 we will be focusing on math, and a lot of reading and writing. Evenings will work best for me so you can do my daily journaling at the end of the day. It will help with your writing skills. If that all sounds good with you, just let me know when you are ready to start. No offense to your sister, but hopefully you didn't get her math gene, or lack thereof".

On a beautiful day in June 1973, I pulled into the CSU admissions office parking lot in my 1966 Ford F-150 three speed on the column pick-up truck. I can't believe it's been almost two years since my negotiations with Mrs. Tucker. I walked up to the receptionist and said: "I am here to see Mrs. Tucker please". "Your name sir", she said. It's Dave Rossiter aka the embarrassing SAT score", I replied. Not fazed by my somewhat sarcastic name, she didn't even look up, and just told me to have a seat. "Hi Mrs. Tucker, not sure if you remember me or not", I said. "Sure, I do, the persistent one. Did you finally take my advice and go to Lamar Community College instead of trying to better your SAT score", as she thumbed through my file. As I handed her the admissions letter, she had originally given me, along with the results of my SAT test showing a 1280 score, I said. "No, and I guess Sammy proved you wrong, when you told me that I would have to retake high school in order to score at least a 1200". She looked at the 1280 score and said: "What, a 1280 score, and who the heck is Sammy? I thanked her for her twenty plus years of experience and for all her help, and said: "See you this fall, as I handed her a fresh pack of Camel cigarettes, a new librarian chain, and a bottle of white out for her typing mistakes.

“Hi Dorothy and Dave, come on in and have a seat at the kitchen table”, said Loretta. “Pres will be right out, and we can start dinner. Thanks so much for coming over”. As my mom and Loretta are visiting, waiting for Pres to change his clothes, I walked over to the window and started watching the horses munching away on hay as it started getting dark. It was about this time of day, in what seems like just yesterday, that KJ and Pres ran down Starfire and my journey with Pres to become a real cowboy began. Now it’s August 1973, and a whole new chapter in my life is about to begin when I move to Fort Collins to start school next month. Had I not just spent almost two years working with Sammy, I might not have been so motivated to go to college, and may have in fact, been satisfied spending the rest of my life working with horses. But Sammy opened my eyes to the value of knowledge and learning that exposed me to the many things I could pursue to complement my life with horses. That said, I was excited about continuing my academic endeavors that were inspired by Sammy, who turned out to be a very inspirational and special person in my life.

“Hi everyone, where’s Charlie”, said Pres as he sat down at the kitchen table while we started passing around the food. “Sorry he couldn’t make it, but he has a big bowling tournament tonight and he didn’t want to let his bowling buddies down”, said mom. “No problem, it’s his loss as he is missing Loretta’s specialty, hamburger helper covered in her secret hot sauce, freshly picked sweet corn, homemade bread, and rhubarb pie with ice cream for dessert. In fact, I picked the rhubarb down by Bear Creek just this morning”, said Pres’ all proud of himself. “I am going to go make another bourbon and water before I get started. Anybody need anything”, said Pres.

Pres sat back down, took a big swig of his drink, and said, “We just wanted to have you guys over before Dave heads off to college. Loretta and I want to thank you and Charlie for sharing Dave with us over the last eight years or so. He filled a real void for us when Mike left home. Admittedly, the adage that “He wouldn’t make a wart on a good Cowboy’s ass” pretty much described Dave when he started here. I know you guys are city folks that really don’t understand the “Cowboy Culture”, but nevertheless, I really applaud you and Charlie for supporting Dave in his pursuit to become a horse person, as he used to say.

“With that said, Dave has accomplished more than I would have ever thought, and I just wanted you to be aware of what he has done.” Boy, that’s really nice of you guys. It’s a shame Charlie isn’t here, since he is the one that has always been skeptical of horse people, ever since his days at the University of Wyoming in Laramie. But that’s ok, I am all ears”, said mom. “Well, Dave has mastered everything I do in my horse-trading business. He can ride anything, has a special way around horses, show preps them, mouths them with accuracy, knows how to get the most out of a horse in the show ring, competes well with horses at gymkhana events, and just about everything else that goes along with running my business”. It was no coincidence that Pres failed to mention my chauffeur duties which started at the age of 13, a very strategic omission. “Oh, I forgot to mention his success in rodeo. I know Charlie wasn’t with you, but I bet you were impressed watching Dave win the saddle bronc riding at the Colorado High School Finals last month. And, on top of that, and everything he has done for me, he worked galloping horses at the racetrack, riding cutting horses for Jim Warner, starting colts for the Peppy Blue Dot Ranch, starting colts for Walt Flanagan racing stables, trading horses out of Hiwan ranch, and other stuff that I am probably forgetting. I could probably go on with his accomplishments but let me stop there and tell you what this means in our way of life, which according to Charlie is maybe suspect”. I looked over at Loretta and she was starting to tear up a little bit, which got me wondering where Pres was going with all of this. Mom, the tough x-army nurse, still all ears, had just turned very curious, as she started to dig into her pie and ice cream.

“Let me explain Dorothy. The term Cowboy and horse person can mean a lot of different things to different people, so I shy away from using them to describe reaching the pinnacle in our way of life in the horse business, and life in general. I much prefer the term “Making a hand”, which is an expression that is short on words but big on meaning. It’s much more appropriate for describing the way of life we adhere to and represent. There is a lifetime of components built into it that are very important to us. It’s hard to put into words, but let me just say that Dave, you have made a hand in the eyes of me and Loretta, and you should be very proud of that. And Dorothy, you and Charlie should be very proud of that as well. Enough said.”

Loretta who had retreated to the bathroom crying, finally came out and asked if anybody wanted more desert. Pres who had just mixed himself another drink sat down and sensed that he better move the discussion to the lighter side so he wouldn't set off Loretta again. "Anyway, I have a couple pieces of good news before we call it a night. I talked with Doc Pollero yesterday and he said that he can get you a weekend job at the CSU large animal clinic, so give him a call when you get settled in. And I got you hired on with me as a wrangler for next summer's Roundup Riders of the Rockies weeklong ride. That way I know that I will see you at least once a year, and the tips you can earn, will go a long way in helping you with your school expenses.

"It was probably a step in the making of a cowhand when he learned that what would pass for heroics in a softer world, was only chores around here."

Wallace Stegner

"That's the end of story telling for tonight everybody", I said. "I didn't know you did all that stuff with Pres", said Daphne, "especially driving horses around at 13 years of age. Things were sure different back then." "Ya, and thanks Dad, for insisting that Max and I get good grades when we were in high school. It sure doesn't sound like you were such a model student, which you conveniently failed to mention to us all these years", said Kelli. "Any more constructive comments", I said. "I never heard of this Sammy guy. Sounds like you spent a lot of time with him, and liked him a lot", said Max. "I really did, and there are so many positive things I learned from him that I will be talking about them in several of our future story telling sessions. Ok, so several takeaways from tonight that I want you to keep in mind as they will be playing into future stories are: First, becoming a real cowboy, and being called a hand by Pres and Loretta. At the time, this meant more to me than anything I had ever experienced, since I had been dreaming about it since I was a little kid. Had it not been for Pres and Loretta, this dream may have never come true. Second is, the positive influence Sammy had on me to pursue college and other endeavors to complement my interest in horses. And third is having parents that were caring and supportive in pursuing my dream growing up. It was hard for my dad at times, but thanks to my Mom who was pretty independent and free spirited, she let that carry over to me. Ok, that's it everybody, now it's Tenley's turn to tell us a story", I said.

Sunday #2-Mel and the Trip to Wheatland (Nov 6)

“Boy, hard to believe it’s going to be Thanksgiving, then Christmas, in only a couple more weeks”, said Daphne. “Do you guys realize how modern-day Christmas is so much different than when I was a kid”, I said. “Today’s kids don’t have the luxury of a Montgomery Wards catalog like I did. I would spend hours looking through that catalog trying to narrow down my Santa list to the top two or three picks. Then there was having to go to midnight mass on Christmas Eve to listen to my dad sing in the church choir. You guys are lucky I am not super religious, and that most people ask me to sing tenor, that is ten or twelve miles away”, I said. “Real funny dad”., said Max laughing. “Just like you told us when you played clarinet in your grade school band, you were last chair, and the band teacher told you not to blow, but just move your fingers when you played in band concerts". "I must admit, being musically inclined was not one of my strong suits. Let's proceed with Sunday #2 storytelling, shall we", I said. Tonight, I will include a story that was very pivotal in my journey from being a cowboy and hand as defined by Pres and Loretta, to becoming more of an accomplished hand as defined by a guy named Mel, and the life changing horseman, named Ray Hunt. Hope you enjoy it!

"Boy, this dorm food is the worst" said my buddy, Roger. "It may not be good, but it's a heck of a lot better than what I ate growing up. My Mom was a terrible cook who seasoned everything with cigarette smoke," I said. Roger is one of my High School Rodeo buddies that I am rooming with in a college dorm called Greene Hall. It was a requirement that all freshmen must live in a dorm on campus. When I moved into the dorm, I was assigned a room with a pothead Hippie who was dealing dope, so luckily Roger's roommate moved out after the first week of classes because he was homesick, and I was able to move in with Roger. Good thing, because back in those days Cowboys and Hippies didn't exactly mix too well. Thank goodness Roger's roommate didn't grow out of his separation anxiety like I did many years ago.

As he was dumping his plate full of food in the garbage, Roger said: "Guess what Dave, I entered you in this weekend's College Rodeo. I know you said you don't have time to ride on the CSU team, but our coach said we need all the help we can get this weekend. I only entered you in the bareback bronc riding since we are really light in that event". "Roger, I have to work until 5:00 on Saturday and Sunday at the Large Animal Vet Clinic. Secondly, I told you I am done Rodeoing because I don't have time to travel with the team and neglect college like I did in High School. And let me remind you my friend, this is my first semester, and I am on probation. But, if Richard can cover for me at the clinic I will be there, but this is the last time". "Roger that", said Roger with a big grin.

It's Thursday morning and I am sitting in the Student Union cafeteria having morning coffee with my partner in crime: Richard Mobley. Just like every other morning, people do a double take when they walk by Richard. He is the only 42-year-old pre-vet student on campus. His midlife crisis was selling off his cattle ranch in Firewall Texas, and moving his wife and two kids to Fort Collins so he could go to Vet School. He had a big Texas drawl, droopy eyes, and weathered looks from working outside his whole life. How he attracted his hot wife Lana was always a mystery, that is until, stay tuned. (I will reveal it to you in a future Sunday session). Anyway, he made working together at the Vet Clinic on the weekends very interesting because he was such a goofy character, with funny stories, and a knack for telling people how the cow ate the cabbage, as he would put it. His go to response in most conversations was: “I- guaran-god-damn-t-ya! “Sure Dave, I’ll cover for you all Saturday afternoon and you all Sunday afternoon, if you all cover the early morning shifts, I-guaran-god-damn-t-ya”, muttered Richard, as he was slurping down his cup of coffee. Then he proceeded to light up a cigarette and put a pinch of Copenhagen between his cheek and gum before he took another bite of his glazed doughnut.

Saturday morning rolls around and I show up at the large animal clinic donning my rodeo attire including an official CSU Rodeo Team shirt, and a belt buckle that could double as a manhole cover. Since there are only a couple Vet students on duty over the weekends, it’s usually only Richard and I looking after the two main hospital barns that house horses and cattle that people have dropped off for treatment. We are basically in charge of their non-medical care which includes feeding, watering, exercising, and cleaning stalls. I take that back; we did get involved a lot with medical care when it came to handling animals for treatment. Many of the vet students were not familiar with large animals which made for some comical, animal/vet student interactions. Anyway, the vets on duty made their rounds in the morning and evening and handled any emergencies such as new arrivals.

Each stall had a card on the gate indicating the name of the animal, owner, and feeding instructions and restrictions. I got done feeding in the first barn and was heading over to feed in the second barn when I heard a voice holler, “Hey you over there. Do you work here?” It’s still dark, but I see a silhouette of two guys standing at the entrance of barn two. “Yes, I do, I will be right there”, I replied. As I walked into the light one guy with a cattleman’s hat on was standing there chewing on an unlit cigar, and the other guy was a lot bigger, wearing a jacket, fancy boots, and no hat. “We are from the 26 Bar Ranch in Springerville Arizona, and we are looking for our purebred Hereford bull that was shipped here on Thursday, said the smaller guy”. While he was asking me about the bull I couldn’t stop staring at the big guy and thinking to myself that this fellow sure looked a lot like John Wayne. “Hello son, my name is John, but most people call me the Duke. And this is my partner Louis Johnson”, he said. “My name is Dave Rossiter, and I am the weekend barn supervisor. It sure is a pleasure meeting you guys, and yes, I just got done feeding what I think is probably your bull, since I saw a card showing the 26 Bar Ranch. He is in the other barn, so just follow me, and I will show you where he’s at.

As we were walking over to the other barn, I said: “Mr. Wayne, my dad was a real fan of yours. I think he probably watched every one of your movies. Actually, you’re the first famous person I have ever met. It’s a real honor to meet you. I can’t wait to tell my mom, since my dad passed away a couple years ago”. Louis started laughing and said. “Ya, he is a real tough guy on the big screen, but truth be known, he is actually a real softy.” (I don’t recall the name of the bull, but let’s just go with #26). “Fact is, #26 is Mr. Duke’s personal pet and prized breeding bull. He won’t even put him in our annual bull sale because he can’t stand the thought of selling him”. Then the Duke spoke up and said: “Unless this place can figure out why 26 is sterile, selling him as a breeding bull is no longer in the discussion, and neither is there a chance of him ending up as ground beef. That is, while he is under my watch, which I hope is for a very long time.”. Louis looked over at the Duke and said: “Well, I hope it’s a long time too”.

“That’s him all right”, said Louis, as #26 put his nose through the gate to sniff the Duke’s hand. Then the Duke looked up and did a 360-degree gaze around the barn and said: “Son, since you are the barn supervisor and all, and look to be very busy supervising, I hope you have the time to make sure #26 here, is well taken care of during his hospital stay. Can I count on you pilgrim?” “You sure can Mr. Wayne”, I said, as I shook their hands, said goodbye, and headed to the other barn, surmising that the Duke might need some alone time with #26. As I meandered to the other barn I started laughing, as I said to myself, “A good caregiver should always be empathetic and aware of the feelings and emotions of patients and their family members during hospital visits” Well, it was the first and last time I would ever see John Wayne in person, and experience what it was like to shake hands with a hand the size of a bear claw, but as fate would have it, I would cross paths with Louis Johnson many years later. That’s another story for another Sunday!

I am running super late, as I pull into the parking lot of the rodeo grounds. I notice that riders are already assembling at the arena gate to ride in the grand entry, which means they have probably already run the bareback horses into the bucking chutes, which is the first event. Packing my gear bag and bareback rigging I walk up to the contestant gate and luckily, there’s Roger standing there holding my number working on convincing the Nitwit with a weekend badge to let me through without a pass. Intimidated by Roger’s 6 foot 2, towering stature, Nitwit finally gave up and let me through. As we were walking toward the bucking chutes Roger said: “I thought you were never going to get here. What took you so long”? Just out of the blue, I had a flashback to the Chris LeDoux song called “Photo Finish” that was so apropos to the situation we just endured. It was a song, as well as his many others, that we had heard a thousand times on an eight-track tape traveling to and from rodeos for what seemed like millions of miles. So, I replied to Roger by singing a few lines of the song:

I pull in through the main gate
And I hear the Anthem playing
I can’t believe it, thank god I finally made it
There’s only one more obstacle that’s standing in my way
It’s a nitwit with a weekend badge

I stop singing while Roger is forcing a laugh with both of us knowing that the song ends with Chris watching his bareback horse get turned out, while he is getting arrested for punching the nitwit with the weekend badge, for not letting him in the contestant gate, because he didn’t have a pass. Then I said, “Thanks Roger, for saving me from smacking the nitwit, and avoiding some unwelcome jail time". "You're welcome, now can you please get serious about scoring a good ride and helping us win this rodeo" said Roger with somewhat of an irritated attitude. "Roger that Roger", I replied while making a quirky face just to get under his skin a little more. Roger was just wired too tight sometimes, and it was all too easy to get him fired up when he was under any pressure. I thoroughly enjoyed it though, and never missed the opportunity when it presented itself.

As Roger was about to pin the number on my back, I said: "Now you're not still fired up and going to stick me in the back are you". He took a deep breath, and with his hands kind of shaking he pinned it on and said: "You drew Scarface, and she is in Chute #4. She is a new mare in Alsbaugh's string, so I don't know much about her. And oh, by the way, Mike came up from Denver to help you set your riggin, and haze for me in the bulldogging". Mike was our self-appointed high school rodeo coach. Nobody ever saw him ride anything that bucked, but he gave everybody a lot of good advice, and moral support. "Hi Mike, good to see you again. Wow it's been a couple of years hasn't it", I said. "Ya, last time I saw you was at the state finals, great to see you again. So, Dave, here's the deal on this horse. I saw her buck out at Pueblo last weekend. She takes a big first jump out of the chute, so she is hard to mark out. Then she ducks hard to the left on the third jump. If you make it past that, she is straight on with some good drop. Keep charging the front end and you will be in the money", said Mike as we set my riggin. The national anthem finishes up and while the grand entry riders exit the arena the announcer says the all too familiar words, "Pull 'em down boys" as Mike takes one more pull on my riggin. Then just before I nodded for the gate, I heard the same words I had heard lots of times before, by the same two cast of characters: Mike yelled "Bear Down Cowboy", followed by Walt Alsbaugh saying in a monotone voice, "Don't waste this horse kid", as he tightened the flank strap.

"Good ride Dave, you tied for first in the go around giving the team a great start. If you draw good tomorrow, we have a chance of winning the average. In that regard, can you try to get here a little earlier tomorrow," said Roger. "You're never going to believe this Roger, but I met John Wayne at the Vet hospital this morning. After I met him, I had to wait 30 minutes to use the office phone to call my mom collect and tell her all about it. Dad was a big John Wayne fan you know! So, the combination of having to wait for the phone, the phone call itself, and having to help a vet student stitch up a cut horse, I got way behind. With that said, I should be here on time tomorrow, barring another unexpected encounter with a celebrity” I said. “You’re right Dave, I absolutely don’t believe that you met John Wayne, and I doubt that your mom did either, since she knows you even better than I do. But, whatever, at least you made up another creative excuse, which is par for the course with you”, said Roger while laughing and rolling his eyes, and finally in a much better mood.

As Roger finished his last eye roll, Mike walked up to us with a couple of cowboys following behind him. “Hey Roger, before we go warm up our horses for the dogging, I want to introduce you and Dave to a couple of friends of mine”, said Mike”. “Dave and Roger, meet Jimmy Wise, and Mel”. While saying “nice to meet you guys” we all shook hands. Jim, who wasn’t a real big guy, had a chiseled face and a flattened nose which was definitely a sign of a cowboy, that likely had participated in many a bar fight. It was no surprise that he about broke my hand with his vice grip handshake. “No offense Roger, but these guys want to talk to Dave because I told them he is not riding on the rodeo team this year like you are. So, let’s go get ready for the dogging. See you guys in a few” said Mike. Then I said, “Good luck Roger”, as they both walked off.

“Hey Pard”, said Jim. I am the yard manager at Farmers and Ranchers Livestock Sale Barn, and Mel here is my right-hand man. We are always trying to find good hands to work for us, especially now that the fall stocker and cow runs have started, and we are crazy busy. We like to hire guys on the Rodeo team, but they are not available most of the year because of rodeo travel on our sale days. Mike said you’re not going to ride on the team this year, and that you’re a good hand, so I just wondered if you’re interested in working on Thursdays and Fridays which are our main sale days”. “I appreciate the offer, sir. I am interested, but this semester I have an 8:00 morning class on Thursdays, and classes all day Friday”, I said. “No problem”, said

Jim, "I can always work around your schedule, so do you want to start working after your class on Thursday's, then maybe next semester you can arrange your classes around Thursday and Friday to get more hours". "That works for me sir. I will be there Thursday after class. Thanks for the opportunity and I look forward to working with you guys", I said. We said our goodbyes while I endured another vice-grip handshake. Jim turned and walked away first, as Mel leaned over and whispered: "You may want to consider shedding that long hairdo if you are going to work for Jim".

As I got into my beat up, yellow, and white, F-150 pickup, I took a deep breath and did a Dave with Dave debrief on the happenings of what turned out to be a very interesting and rewarding day. Ok, first off, I shook the hand of a real movie star who had bear claw hands, then learned from his partner that he may not be as tough as Hollywood would have you believe. Then I shook the hand, (and got a new job in a New York second) of a cowboy who had vice grip hands, and who was probably tougher in real life than John Wayne ever was, or even tried to be, on the big screen. Then, I started up the truck and pulled the shifter in and down into first gear, and drove away, saying to myself: "Well Pilgrim, I hope tomorrow's draw is as good as today's".

Fast forward to the summer of 1976 and I am standing in the sale barn alley with good ole Mel. "Let's sort this last bunch of steers into two sizes, then I will treat you to dinner to go, before the ladies close down the cafe for the night", said Mel. "I have something I want to run by you while we are waiting on some fine sale barn cuisine", he said. "Works for me Mel, you sort, and I will run the gate this time", I replied. "Ok, Dave, bye, bye, in, bye, in, in, bye----- -----in, bye, done. Now, that there is what I call, two nice sets of black Baldy steers. They should bring top dollar tomorrow, let's go order our grub"!

"Holy cow Mel, the last time we sat down together, in this fine establishment was when you talked me into partnering with you to train that cutting horse mare that Jim couldn't straighten out. I remember that I did all the work, but we ended up splitting the profit 50/50. I must admit though, that you're coaching me on how to fix her really worked. It was most definitely, very unconventional from how Jim and I approach horse training", I said. "We will just have the usual to go Millie", said Mel. Then he went on to say, "Well, that's what I wanted to talk to you about. I know you and Jim still start colts and take in problem horses to fix. I have watched both of you over the past couple of years, and your training methods are pretty similar and typical rodeo cowboy mentality, which I am not saying is all that bad. However, with that said, you're young and not as locked into a training culture like Jim is. It would be virtually impossible to convince him to change the way he interacts with horses. You, on the other hand, would seem open to some new ideas and methods, or at least would be willing to listen". "Ok Mel, where the heck are you going with all this? I said. "I know it's short notice, since it's already Wednesday, but I want you to do me a favor and let me take you to a colt starting clinic in Wheatland Wyoming this weekend. We can leave Friday after the sale is over and take one of the colts you and Jim have outback, that you haven't messed with yet. I will drive my rig and pay for the hotel room and clinic fee". "Orders up and we are closing up" yelled Millie in her deep voice. Before I could say anything, Mel jumped up, threw down his napkin, put on his hat, picked up his sack of dinner to go, said to Millie, "Put it on my tab", and said to me, "See ya Friday, and I will give you the details on our drive to Wheatland", as he shot out the door.

The Friday sale ended about 2:00 that afternoon and by the time we got the colt loaded in the trailer and Millie finished packing us a late lunch to go, it was around 2:30 when we hit the I-25 North, on ramp, headed to Wheatland. "Alright Dave, we have about a two-hour drive to shoot the breeze and swap stories. With my bad back and undersized bladder I will need to make a pit stop in Cheyenne to unload this coffee I am drinking, and walk around for a bit", said Mel. "Sounds good Mel, I am dying to hear what this clinic is all about, and why you are so insistent that I attend this thing", I said. "I will get to that, but since we have a lot of time, let me first, tell you a little bit about me, which will help you better understand why we are headed to Wheatland", said Mel. Trying to get comfortable, I stretched out on the bench front seat of his pickup, which was covered with a wool Navajo blanket that was making my back itch, and said: "Ok, I am all ears my friend".

“I grew up near the Alvord Ranch which is in southeastern Oregon. My mom, dad, big brother, and I lived on a 100-acre ranch, (calling it a ranch is maybe a stretch) that had a 1200 square foot house, barn, corrals, and horse pastures. My dad worked on the Alvord Ranch as a buckaroo and raised horses, on the side, at our place”. “What the heck is a buckaroo? I don’t think I have ever heard that term before”, I said. “I will give you a short version because there is a lot that goes into being a buckaroo. The buckaroo culture is an outgrowth of a tradition that goes back over 300 years to the original Californio Vaqueros that began in California and moved into the Great Basin country of Oregon and Nevada. Basically, you and Jim kind of have a rodeo cowboy culture when dealing with horses and cattle, while the buckaroo culture is, how should I say this, a more refined, and sophisticated, culture of horsemanship. My dad taught my brother and I the buckaroo tradition, along with intention with horses. I will explain intention some other time. The buckaroo tradition includes the fine art of taking a two-year-old colt from unbroken to what we call straight up in the bridle, packing a signal bit, the process of which takes about four to five years. I will explain more about the buckaroo, and the training process some other time, but let me just say for now, that there are other horsemanship cultures out there that a guy like you, that has such a passion for horses, should get exposed to”. “And that’s why you hijacked me, and we are headed to Wheatland, so I can learn how to be a buckaroo, right? I said. “Sort of along those lines, but maybe not so much the buckaroo tradition, but more so the concept of intention. Let me finish explaining”.

“My brother followed in my father’s footsteps working as a buckaroo on quite a few of the Great Basin cattle ranches in Oregon and Nevada. We talk at least once a week, and the conversation usually ends up with something about horses. He has been telling me about a guy named Tom Dorrance that comes out to the ranch he currently works at to show the buckaroos how to get along better with horses. He said this guy is totally amazing and reminds him a lot of our dad in a lot of ways. Our dad passed away a couple years ago. Sometime I will tell you more about him too. “So finally, a guy named Tom Dorrance is doing the clinic, right? “Nope, don’t die on me yet, we are just about there. It seems there is a very good friend of Tom’s who has been going around doing clinics and teaching people a lot of what he learned from Tom. His name is Ray Hunt, according to my brother. He has never met him, but he said Tom speaks very highly of him, and that he just so happens to be doing a clinic in Wheatland, and that I should go watch this guy". "It almost took the whole ride to Cheyenne to finally get it out of you. A guy named Ray Hunt is doing the clinic. Would that be correct, Mr. Mel, the buckaroo", I said in a worn-down tone of voice". "Bingo" he replied, as we hit the off ramp to Cheyenne.

We pulled out of the truck stop, as Mel was already working on his coffee refill and said: "I should be able to make it to Wheatland without another pit stop, but I have to say my bladder was about to bust and my not so well healed broken back was killing me before we got here. Oh, the joys of getting older and paying for the wrecks in my earlier years. Anyway, I will quit talking and it's your turn to tell me a little bit about yourself". "Ok, well, you see Mel, my parents were city slickers, but when I was a little kid, my dream was to be a cowboy and own my own horse. I got a paper route when I was ten years old to start saving for a horse, and to go to college. I eventually ended up buying a horse that my dad found when I was almost thirteen. It was an unbroke mare that had a lot of bad habits. I spent a couple months providing free entertainment to the boarders at the barn I kept her at, trying to get along with her. Then one evening when she drug me around a pasture and busted me up, I met a cowboy neighbor named Pres who ran her down on his horse, and caught her for me.

It turned out that Pres was a real cowboy and was in the horse-trading business, and had also rodeoed in his younger years, just like Jim. He and his wife Loretta, kind of adopted me and I worked for them for about eight years, along with other horse related side jobs. I learned everything I know about horses, mostly from Pres. Not only did I learn to ride and handle horses, but he also got me started in Little Britches and Junior Rodeo, which carried through to High School Rodeo. And, you already know my story on why I didn't continue in College Rodeo. Anyway, Pres was a lot like Jim, so I guess you could say he is responsible for me learning the Rodeo Cowboy Mentality of interacting with horses. I have to say though, the highlight of my life was when he and Loretta told me, before leaving for college, that in their eyes, I had become a real hand. That was sort of a confirmation that my dream of becoming a real cowboy had officially come true.”

“That’s an interesting story Dave. I am glad you mentioned the word hand. It’s sort of universally accepted that when anyone involved with horses and cattle is called a hand, it really means something. At least it always has for me and my family. The important thing to consider, at least from where I sit, is that you can always become a much better, and accomplished hand, by learning to interact with horses and cattle using less aggressive and dominating methods and incorporating a better understanding, from the animal’s perspective. “When we leave Wheatland on Sunday night, hopefully that will make a little more sense to you”. “I guess I sort of see what you’re talking about based on how you had me work with that cutting horse mare”, I said. “By the way, why did you take my advice on that anyway, you hardly knew me back then”, replied Mel. “Well, as the old saying goes: “You Don’t Learn Much from a Mules Second Kick”. I didn’t take your advice the first time, when you told me I better get a haircut before going to work for Jim. As you know, after a couple of weeks on the job, you guys jumped me, and Jim shaved my head using the brand inspectors’ clippers”. “Ya, you looked like a real motley mess when he got through with you”, Mel said chuckling.” “That’s exactly why I decided to listen to you the second time”, I said.

After dropping the colt off at the Wheatland County Fairgrounds and getting him fed and watered for the night, we found a cheap motel room in the tiny town of Wheatland. As Mel opened the door and we carried our bags in, I noticed that there was only one bed in the room. So, I said: “Mel, you’re a nice guy and all, but there’s no way I am sharing a bed with you. I can just sleep on the floor. Don’t worry, it’s no big deal to me.” “Don’t sweat it Dave, you’re not my type anyway”, he said joking. “I can’t sleep in a bed because of my back, so they are supposed to bring me a rocking chair to sleep in. The bed is all yours”, said Mel. As we got ready to turn in for the night, Mel got comfortable in his rocking chair and said. “You ever notice what never seems to change, with just about every small-town café, like the one we just ate at tonight, and just about every sale barn café across the country”. “You got me Mel, what”. The waitresses all have deeper voices than most men, from smoking all their lives, and everything is greasy, even the dinner rolls and after dinner mints". "Great observation Mel. As I am about to nod off, I am thinking to myself how lucky I am to end up with the double bed, all to my lonesome, instead of the floor. Poor Mel, he must have a rough time trying to sleep in a rocking chair.

As I began to fall asleep, I jumped up to a loud roaring noise. I looked over and Mel was fast asleep in his rocker that had quit rocking, snoring like a freight train. Wide awake, I just laid in bed, staring at the ceiling, thinking about Mel's comments today. "Learning to interact with horses and cattle using less aggressive and dominating methods and having a better understanding from the animal's perspective". He is right, Jim would probably laugh him out of the café if he laid this stuff on him and my guess is, so would Pres, since they are so set in their ways, and have done things the same way their whole lives. But Mel seems like a smart guy that I can trust, and he cared enough to bring me up here and pay for everything. And now that I think about it, even though I have never really seen him work directly with horses, he sure is a natural, working with cattle, sheep, goats, and pigs. He sorts and handles cattle much better than anybody in the yard, including me or Jim, without them getting all bothered and riled up. He doesn't ever use a hot shot like most everybody else', and he is always calm, patient, never losing his temper, which seems to carry over to the animals and people he's around. Plus, we sure fixed that cutting horse mare when nobody else could. Assuming I could stay awake tomorrow, I then told myself that I will trust Mel and keep an open mind tomorrow. Then, I finally gave up, and retreated to the front seat of the pickup, to try and get a couple hours of shut eye.

The next morning, I fed the colt early, then walked him out of his stall while Mel paid the gal sitting at a folding card table next to the arena gate. There were about 20 participants, and since Wheatland is in the middle of Wyoming most of them looked like cowboys and cowgirls who had probably been around horses most of their lives. Soon, this grizzled looking cowboy, with a toothpick hanging out of his mouth, rides up and instructs everybody to take the halters off their horses, and turn them loose in the arena. While the horses were all running around the arena, he rode over to the gate where everybody was watching and said. "My name is Ray Hunt and I'm here for the horse, to help him get a better deal". I looked over at Mel who was sitting in the bleachers with a big grin on his face.

It's kind of getting late, so I will give you more details next Sunday, but suffice it to say that by Sunday afternoon we were all riding our colts, walking, jogging, and loping them around the arena, with not one of them bucking or running off on their first ride. This was unheard of in our so-called Rodeo Cowboy culture of starting colts. Our colt culture was to start breaking the will of the horse on the first ride by staying on until the horse quit bucking. Needless to say, I was simultaneously humbled, impressed, and dumbfounded. As we progressed through the weekend Ray kept throwing out his cowboy logic with one liners like: "Believe in your horse, so your horse can believe in you" or "The human has an opinion, the horse is a fact" or "The horse will teach you if you will listen" or "Make the wrong thing difficult, and the right thing easy" or feel, timing and balance, and the classic one was, "Why does it take a lifetime to learn to live a lifetime". I started thinking to myself that I had never heard any of this horse logic before, and I am going to need Mel to explain a lot of this stuff. Good thing we have a long drive home to talk. What an unbelievable weekend to say the least!

I finished loading the colt in the trailer and walked over to get in the passenger side of the truck, and there sat Mel. "I am all tuckered out, so you can drive home while I sleep. We can talk about the weekend after the sale on Friday. Are you sure you don't mind driving us home," said Mel. I then replied: "No problem, Pres, I mean Mel, been there done that". So, I hopped in, started the truck, grabbed a Chris LeDeux tape out of my bag, popped it in, and started the long drive home, with the volume turned all the way up, to drown out Mel's snoring. After unloading the colt and putting him up for the night I woke up Mel who was still snoring in the front seat. "Thanks so much for everything Mel. Unfortunately, I won't be here Friday, since I leave Wednesday for the Roundup Riders of the Rockies for a week, so we can get together and talk when I get back", I said. "Your welcome Dave, adios, and have a good time babysitting those rich, drugstore cowboys", he replied.

"You're not working on the horse; you're working on yourself."

Ray Hunt

“Ok, that’s it for tonight. Sorry I was a little long-winded tonight. Once I get on a roll, I just can’t stop myself”. The collective response was: “We know”. Then Max said: “Man, you sure had a knack for finding jobs easily, that’s for sure. And that Richard guy sounds like he was a real piece of work. I can’t wait to hear how he landed his good-looking wife.” “I heard your John Wayne story before, and just like Roger and your mom, I’m not so sure I believe it”, said Daphne with a chuckle. Then I said: “Ya know the part when the Duke was talking about his bull, under his watch, hoping it was a long time, and Louis hoping it was a long time too? Those comments made a lot more sense to me years later when I didn’t realize at the time, the Duke was dying of cancer. That was the year, (1976) that he made his last movie, which was called, the “Shootist” where he ended up dying on the big screen. Then in real life, he died in 1979, three years after I had met him”, I said. Then Kelli said: “Mel sure seemed like a real nice and caring guy. I can’t wait to hear what he had to say about the weekend clinic, and if it changed how, you started colts after that”. “Well then, little missy, you better make sure you’re here next Sunday, so you can find out”, I replied.

Sunday #3- Des Moines and the Launch of an Incredibly Diverse and Adventurous Career (Nov 13)

“What’s it like being able to see without contacts, now that you had your cataract surgery”, said Kelli. “I must say, it is a life changer. I don’t think I have seen this well since I was six years old, wearing my black rimmed, mayonnaise jar glasses. At least now, I won't have to worry about losing my contacts when some chump knocks my goggles off during the swim. Remember, that just happened to me back in April at the Oceanside race. I ended up doing the bike and run portion in the Mr. Magoo division", I said. Waiting for laughs from the peanut gallery, that never materialized, I said: "Tough crowd tonight, guess I will just go directly to storytelling."

"Welcome to the Charco Broiler, can I get you two cowboys a table, or would you prefer to sit in the bar", said the hostess. "The bar is fine, "I said. "Now that there is a host-ess with a couple nice most-ess-es" whispered Mel laughing, who then went on to say; "This is my favorite place in town for a steak, but I rarely come here, even though it's almost within walking distance from the sale barn. Jim is a recovering alcoholic, so he won't come near this place. He told me one time that whenever he starts drinking, people around him seem to always end up getting hurt, both friend and foe". "Guess he is not a happy drunk", I said chuckling. "With that temper of his, he can be dangerous to be around, even when he is sober. I can't imagine what he would be like drunk. I sure don't need to find out, that's for sure", said Mel.

"So how was the RRR ride Dave". "It was great, I got to see Pres, and it was very lucrative to say the least. As I mentioned to you, it's a bunch of rich guys that go on a ten-day ride through the Rocky Mountains every year and play cowboys. As a wrangler, I was assigned ten drugstore fellers, and their horses to take care of, and I mean take care of literally. Everything is catered for by Jetons out of Texas, from the gourmet food to their soft beds, to hot showers, all taking place in a new camp location every night, under huge circus tents. The views on the 15-mile ride everyday were awesome. On Wednesday night they flew the Central City Opera show into camp, to perform, and it was incredible. Then, on Friday night, they flew in John Denver, who performed around the campfire, singing songs on request from intoxicated, wanna be cowboys. It was a real "Rocky Mountain High", I said laughing. "And the best part, was the $1,200 in tips that I made, plus a new pair of Justin boots, that I scored from John Justin, who just happened to be in my string. I picked a fancy pair out of a catalog, and he said he would have them shipped to me when he got home". So, order whatever you want tonight, Mel, it's on me, since

I am flush with cash, and I really do owe you for the Wheatland weekend”, I said. Nice segway into the reason we are here, that is, to talk about Ray Hunt, I said to myself.

“Let me ask you the million-dollar question Dave, which is: were you impressed enough with what you experienced at the clinic, to commit to changing from your Rodeo Cowboy mentality/culture of interacting with horses, to a culture like what you saw Ray Hunt use? Just answer yes or no”, said Mel. I replied by saying: “Mel, Pat taught me to never to ask a question, when you are trying to make a sale, that the person can just say no to, and risk losing the sale from the very get go. You’re better off, starting out by asking me how I felt about the clinic, and my impression of Ray Hunt, whose way of interacting with horses is very different from what you learned from Pres and Jim”. “I have no idea who Pat is, and I am not trying to sell you anything, well ok, I take that back, maybe I am trying to sell you another way of interacting with horses. So, go ahead and answer your question first, before you answer mine, if Pat’s ok with that”, he said joking.

“Mel, to be honest with you, I was really taken aback with what I saw at the clinic. I have never seen someone get that much done with so many horses in such a short amount of time. Not to mention, the total lack of any kind of force, coercion, or intimidation. The whole concept of building the trust of the horse is foreign to me, although there have been people, I have met along the way that talked about the whole trust thing, but I guess I didn’t pay much attention to them because I was so committed to Pres’s way of doing things. As far as my impression of Ray, he is a lot like you in his mannerisms. He seems to be very, even keel with his emotions, no matter what the horse is doing. He also seems to be super aware of what the horse is thinking and feeling, which is something I don’t really pay much attention to unless they are getting ready to buck or run off. And as far as most of his cowboy logic, that he kept throwing out, you are going to have to explain most of them to me. So, the answer to your million-dollar question is a resounding yes, and my million-dollar question to you, is when and how do we make that happen”. Then Mel replied. “Starting next Saturday night when you bring dinner over and we sit down at my kitchen table located in my cozy little mobile home tucked away, as you know, right next to the loading chutes. That's when we can start with the how. Oh, and by the way, no sale barn takeout please".

It's a beautiful Wednesday afternoon in Denver as I stop by to visit Sammy before heading back to Fort Collins. I don't remember why I didn't have classes that day, but let's just go with: I didn't have classes for whatever reason. "Well, hi Dave, come on in", said Ethyl. "Sammy is out on our back patio, thanks to all the money the neighborhood kids/students, (including you and your sister, by the way), donated, to pay for remodeling the back door, so we can roll his oversized bed out there.". "Good to see you Dave, and welcome to my new office", said Sammy. "And what brings you down here on this delightful day". "Well, I had a day off, and just came down to help my mom move some furniture, and chat with her about some school stuff. I finished early, so I thought I would swing by and say hi before I head back to the Fort". "None of my business, but what did you talk to your mom about regarding school stuff. Anything, I can help you with", he said. I then started thinking to myself, that this guy is amazing. It's never about him, but always about his interest in helping other people, even though he is the one that was dealt the bad hand in life. Just then, I remembered all the reading I did for him about the culture he practices called Stoicism. I remember that Stoicism is the ancient Greek school of philosophy that taught that virtue, the highest good, is based on knowledge, and that the wise live in harmony with the divine reason. (I sort of recall that divine reason has something to do with good morals, but whatever) And they endure pain or hardship without the display of feelings, and without complaint. I'm sure there was something in there I missed, like compassion, and humility. Nevertheless, that sure explains why Sammy is such a cool character who always told me that his sole purpose in life is helping other people because it gives him a reason to wake up every morning and enjoy the life, he is so thankful for.

"Of course, it's your business if you want it to be, which I know you always do when there is an opportunity to help someone else besides yourself", I replied. "So, here's the deal Sammy, I proceeded to explain to him that I had completed the two years of pre-vet classes with a B average and applied for admission to vet school, only to find out that I was not accepted, even after making the cut to get an interview. I talked to Doc Pollero, who knows the Vets that interviewed me, and they said that I came close to making the cut, but several members sensed that I was maybe not as committed as I should be to spending the rest of my life as a large animal vet. Doc said they told him that I should apply again next year and if I interview with more enthusiasm, I should be a shoe in. I continued to explain to Sammy that I was kind of having second thoughts for several reasons. I don't have the money to fund four years of Vet School, and I sure won't be able to work part time to fund it. And honestly, even if I did find a way to pay for it, I am just not sure I want to commit to doing the same thing, day in, and day out, for the rest of my life. I don't want to let my friends and family down, but you know me Sammy, I love change, new challenges, and the next big adventure. In the worst case, I can graduate next year with a bachelor's in animal nutrition, then go to graduate school and get a Masters in Ag-Economics, which I have really taken an interest in. So that my friend is my dilemma.

"Dave, neuroscience tells us that we have three brains. We have a head, heart, and gut brain. Our head brain is analytical, and for things like perception, meaning, and how we see the world. The heart brain is for emotions, values, and how we connect with others. It's kind of where we get compassion and our passions. And our gut brain is for our sense of self and self-preservation. It's the foundation of our courage. Your heart and head brains are the cause of your dilemma. Listen to your gut brain on this one. The vets that interviewed you sure did, and my guess is, so did your mom. Best of luck to you in graduate School". With a big sigh of relief I said, "Thanks Sammy".

As Mel's blue healer named Sam watched us devour an extra-large pizza, Mel said, "thanks for bringing dinner Dave. Let me get started by giving you more details on the horsemanship culture I was taught, which is not a whole lot different than what I saw Ray Hunt practicing at the clinic. But first, did you notice how Ray came across as more concerned and more friendly to the horses than the participants, or was it just me", he said. "I sure did notice, in fact it was almost like he was constantly irritated by how we had no clue on how to do a lot of things his way, and we didn't understand a lot of what he was trying to explain to us. I wonder why he was like that, because he really seemed to be a nice guy when we visited with him after the clinic on Saturday afternoon", I said. "It's kind of eerie, but Ray reminded me a lot of my dad. There are so few people in the horse world that understand their horsemanship culture, and even if they did, they wouldn't have the discipline to make the necessary changes which are so difficult but can be life changing. My dad was no Ray Hunt, by any means, but I think that they both got frustrated because of that, and the fact that most people simply didn't understand things from the horse's point of view. The bottom line is that the horsemanship culture I will attempt to teach you takes a lot of time and effort to learn, and unlike most other horsemanship cultures, it requires you to change as a person. Remember how Ray started out the clinic by saying "I am here for the horse, to help him get a better deal." I think Ray is so far beyond most people when it comes to understanding horses and himself, that he probably does his clinics, knowing he will just have to tolerate most people, in hopes that even a fraction of what he teaches will stick, and make horses' lives a little bit better.

Dad's, go to cowboy logic' was the five words: awareness, intention, imagine, imagination, and boundaries. Other than mentioning awareness, Ray didn't mention these terms, but they are similar, in meaning, to the ones he used. I am going to end tonight's discussion with this. Go home and think about those five words and how they apply to horses. Then when we meet next time, we can start by discussing your thoughts. I just heard trucks pulling into the yard to load out five pens of yearling heifers, so I best end things for the night and get to work". As he thanked me for the pizza, while shooting out the door, I was left sitting there thinking to myself that what I don't know is what Mel was just talking about tonight, however what I do know, is that there's no such thing as long goodbyes with Mel.

As I sat down at the table in the Student Union cafeteria, Richard was working on his second cup of coffee, doughnut, and cigarette. "Where you all been, your late", he said. "Dr. Bill and I ran our three-mile course around the intermural fields this morning and we got a late start.

Sorry about that”, I said. “Lana keeps telling me that I need to start exercising. What time are you guys meeting tomorrow morning”, he said. Before I replied, I thought to myself, if he is serious about running three miles, this is going to be a show I won’t want to miss. So, I replied, “We meet at 6:00 am in the Moby Gym locker room. After we run, we shower and change there, so bring your school clothes with you”. “Ok, I will see you all in the morning at 6, I guaran-god-damn-t-ya”, he said.

“Morning Dave”, said Dr Bill who was a professor in the Radiation Biology department and an avid runner that recruited me as his handball partner in the winter, and running companion in the summer. He was lean and fit for a forty-something year old. I still couldn’t beat him at handball, but I was making progress hanging with him on our three-mile runs. “My buddy Richard invited himself to run with us this morning. I hope you don’t mind,” I said. “Of course not, if that chain smoking, potbellied, Copenhagen chewing, picture of unhealthy, can even make it a mile without dropping over of a heart attack, I will be totally impressed”, said Dr. Bill. Just as I was telling him that I doubt Richard will even show up, here walks in Richard wearing a pair of wrangler jeans, cut off at the knees, an old t-shirt with holes in it, that said, “Don’t Mess with Texas”, a pair of Keds, high top tennis shoes, and white crew socks that went all the way up to his knees. “All right boys, you all ready to go” said Richard while doing some quick stretches. So, as we walk outside, Dr. Bill points out the course for Richard, thinking he should at least know the three-mile course so when we drop him, he knows where to go. We start out with an easy first quarter mile and Richard is running right behind us, not yet breathing hard. Then we picked it up to around a 7:30 minute per mile pace for the rest of the first mile and Richard is still hanging. Halfway through the second mile we pick it up to a 6:30 pace while Richard is still cruising behind us on our heels, while I am looking at Dr. Bill in total shock. We are both thinking the same thing. This can’t be happening. Richard then moved to the front at the start of the third mile, dropped the hammer, and dropped me and Dr. Bill, like a bad habit, doing a sub-6-minute pace.

As Dr. Bill and I were getting dressed, Richard walked out of the shower buck naked giving us a full-frontal view while he said: “I forgot to mention to you all that I was an all-state cross-country runner in high school, I guaran-god-damn-t-ya". Just as he finished his sentence, it was in that moment that I came to the realization that two things were now making more sense to me. The first was how he was able to just destroy me and Dr. Bill on a three-mile run, and second, how he was able to land such a hot-looking wife. Full frontal, and it wasn't his, six pack, pot belly, mystery solved.

Tonight, we are feasting on Colonel Sanders takeout. Mel described it as a barrel of extra crispy clucks and a bucket of slaw with mashed spuds, gravy, and dinner rolls. Eating saturated fat was safe back then because health experts hadn't invented the ill effects of eating foods high in cholesterol or saturated fat yet. "To be very honest with you Mel, I thought about how those terms applied to horses, and I have no idea what you're talking about," I said. "No problem, Dave, I didn't think you would make any sense of them. Let me start out by telling you a quick story that our dad told me and my brother many, many years ago. Picture a herd of zebras grazing on the Serengeti in Africa. Zebras are a close cousin of horses, so they are very similar in that they are both prey animals and survive by knowing when to flee from predators. How is it that they know when to flee from lions one instant, but other times, in a similar situation, the herd is relaxed, and happily grazing while a pride of lions are nearby within striking distance. Basically, zebras are super sensitive and aware of their environment. And, not only that, but they also have a sixth sense for knowing, with precision, the intent of their predators", said Mel. "So how does that apply to training horses", I asked.

"Horses are even more sensitive, aware, and tuned into the intent of predators than Zebras. That's a big reason why they have survived for over 50 million years. The top three priorities for horses, in order of importance, are avoiding being eaten by predators, finding adequate food, and reproducing. Since man is a major league predator, he is viewed by the horse as a threat, until convinced otherwise. Convincing the horse that you are not a threat, and gaining his full trust and respect is the foundation to my dad's and Ray's culture of interacting with horses. It is, however, as I have told you before, one of the most difficult things to achieve, which is why most horse folks never even figure it out, let alone, ever attempt to do it, “said Mel.

“That all sounds fine and good Mel, but I am just not seeing how this applies to training horses”, I said again, in sort of an apologetic tone of voice. “Ok, let me spell it out to you in simple terms. When you can get the horse to trust and respect you as his leader, he is willing to do whatever you are asking him to do because he wants to do it, he is not bothered, and you eventually form, sort of a partnership, whereby the horse and rider interact in harmony. On the other hand, if you don’t have that trust and respect, you can still get things done with a horse, as an unwilling partner, who does whatever you are telling him to do, because he is forced to do it, or has just flat given up. To put it bluntly, you and Jim have never gained the full trust and respect of horses, and as a result, you have never experienced the sheer joy and rewards of a harmonious partnership with a horse. And it just so happens that this harmonious partnership that I am describing, is exactly what you witnessed at the clinic, and said you were so impressed with. So now, please don’t tell me again that you’re not seeing how this applies to training horses because I may go Ray Hunt on you and say, “Maybe you will figure it out someday, but probably not”, said Mel joking. “I think I am starting to get it”, I replied, forcing a smile.

“Good, so, let’s end the evening with some final thoughts. Here is how we can use the five terms I first threw out to you to gain and maintain the full trust and respect of the horse. Awareness is two-fold, it is critical you are fully aware of how the horse is always feeling. Likewise, recognize that the horse is fully aware of its surroundings, lives in the moment, and senses everything you are thinking, be it your fears, thoughts and intentions which are underpinned by your character, personality, and training methods. Use imagine as the first thing in communicating with your horse before any natural or artificial aids. Eventually the horse will do what you are asking by your just imagining what you want him to do because he is so sensitive, assuming you are well connected to him. Use your imagination to communicate with him in baby steps to fit the situation. This kind of horse training is non-linear, in that a step-by-step program does not fit every horse and every situation. My dad used to call this situational leadership. And the last thing is boundaries. Establish and maintain them with the horse, in a consistent and non-threatening fashion”, said Mel.

“Ok, with that, I will send you on your way, and from now on we can meet out in the arena and start applying what I talked about tonight, to training your horses. It’s going to take a lot of time and effort, but I am confident you can do it. Thanks again for the greasy clucks Dave, and to all, a goodnight”, said Mel.

“Any other questions for Dave before I dismiss him and we decide whether he was successful today in defending his thesis.”, said Dr. Ward. “Dr. Cummings”? “No Jerry, I am good, nice job Dave”. “Dr. Walters”? “Ditto with me”, he said. “How about you, Dr. Wilbur”. “I have no further questions Dr. Ward, everything is copacetic with me”, he said in his usual prim and proper way, always looking to use big words. “It’s been a long six hours, Dave, so we won’t drag this out much longer. You’re excused, so please go wait in the graduate student office, and I will send Sherry down to get you, when we have reached our verdict. “Bailiff, please cuff him and escort him down to his cell”, said Dr. Ward as he performed his signature, deep belly laugh, while everybody else forced an end of a long day, let’s get this over with laugh.

As I was waiting to be summoned to return to the meeting room to receive the verdict, as to whether I had passed my orals, which would allow me to graduate with my master’s degree in Agricultural Economics, I got to thinking. My major professor, Dr. Ward, who was from Austria, and kind of hard to understand at times, was very generous to offer me the graduate assistantship, and mentor me on writing my thesis, as well as the many articles I wrote for refereed journals, and trade publications. He was truly a great guy, and he really taught me a lot. I also got a lot of experience teaching undergraduate classes, as a graduate assistant, that came with a whopping $350 a month salary. Since I fast tracked the graduate program, that included teaching obligations, I had to resign from my outside jobs and live on $11.66 per day, which was very challenging at times, to say the least.

As I was putting my feet up on the desk to get more comfortable, I reminded myself that I was getting pretty sick of practicing how to live like a homeless person. My normal day was getting up early from sleeping on the couch at my roommate's place. When I couldn't afford to pay rent any more, they kicked me out of my room, and rented it out, but said I could use the couch for free. Next, I would head to Moby gym to work out and shower. I would then go to classes, teach classes, do research, then go to dinner at one of the many venues I had available to me. They included: invites to different professors' houses, as well as secretaries in the Economics and Animal Science departments. Happy hours with free food, that is, if you ordered a beer. And then there was the lavish Sirloin Stockade restaurant, on special occasions, when they had specialty night, with all you could eat dinners, including free ice cream cones to boot. Then I would go study in the library, or head to the computer center to run my research programs. To wind up the evening I would stop by the student union cafeteria as they were closing, and my friend Betty would give me whatever doughnuts were left from that morning, so I would have something to eat the following day. After showering again at Moby gym, I would head back, and retire for the night on the lumpy, beauty rest couch, that was located exactly three thousand two hundred and twenty-two steps from the Moby gym locker room.

"Congratulations Dave, it was unanimous, you passed", said Dr. Ward. I went around the table shaking hands with everybody, while thanking them for supporting me, and serving on my graduate committee. Then Dr. Ward said, "Before we adjourn, a couple of announcements. First off, Dr. Kienholtz just got a three-month research grant, and he wants you to head it up. It pays very well, and he said he can be flexible with your hours, which will give you time to travel to interviews while you're on your job search. But selfishly, it will keep you around for three more months so I can try to talk you into staying around to get your PhD. And secondly, I hesitate to tell you this, but regarding a possible job, Dr. Wilbur, has a contact in Des Moines Iowa that is looking for someone with your qualifications". "Thanks again everybody" I said as I was packing up my stuff hoping that one of these fine professors would offer to have me over for dinner. Not even close, and definitely, no cigar, as they couldn't file out fast enough. I would like to think that it was because Christmas was only a couple weeks away, and they were busy with family stuff for the holidays. But no, that probably wasn't the reason. I think it was the fact that six grueling hours of my company was all they could stand for one day. Oh, well, maybe I will just walk over to the Stockade and celebrate by eating a nice dinner with a big soft swirl, vanilla ice cream cone for dessert, while enjoying the lights blinking on the Christmas tree, located next to the ice cream machine.

It's the middle of February 1979, and I am sitting in the lobby of a company located in Des Moines Iowa called Midwest Commodity Brokerage. Now that the holidays are behind me, and I am making some good money as a research associate on a project called "The Economics of Feeding Spent Grains from Gasohol Production in Colorado", I am enjoying the luxuries of no longer living like a homeless person. I was also able to afford this fine pin stripe, three-piece suit that I am sporting on my first official job interview, in the post college era, of my already varied and diverse job career, that started with my infamous paper route, at ten years of age.

"Hi Dave, Earl can see you now, so please follow me" said Gladys's his assistant. Gladys was very cheery, polite, and could have easily served as the poster child for the corn-fed state of Iowa. She most definitely looked the part. As I walked in the trading room, there was a big clacker board on one wall, facing about five broker offices enclosed by glass along the opposite wall. "Earl is in the corner office on the phone. He will be with you in just a minute," said Gladys's. I sat down facing the board that displayed the commodities with the, open, last, change, and close price quotes. The commodities included corn, wheat, live cattle, feeder cattle, live hogs, pork bellies, silver, gold, Swiss franc, dollar, etc., Then in the corner, there was a ticker tape banging away, with a couple farmers standing next to it reading intently, with an occasional glance up at the clacker board. "Thanks for your patience, Dave", said Earl as he shook my hand. "It's five minutes until the Merc opening, (Chicago Mercantile Exchange) and we are expecting a limit down, in the live hogs and belly markets due to a bearish hog and pig report at yesterday's close. It's going to be a hectic trading session today, so please bear with me, and we can talk when time allows." "Sounds good Earl", I said.

“Boy, what a crazy day. It was a real blood bath for a lot of our hog producers. We have been bullish on hog prices and most of our clients were not hedged, which is not good after what happened today. Anyway, I hope I answered all your questions. You come highly recommended, and we would like to make you an offer for a broker position. I need to go through HR, and we will have an offer mailed to you in the next few days. I hate to rush things, but an ice storm is moving in, and if you don’t get to the airport soon, you may not get out of here tonight. I need to take this call; Gladys can arrange a cab to take you to the airport. Talk to you soon”, said Earl, as he answered his ringing phone while shaking my hand.

I walked out of Earl’s office into the trading room, and as I was walking towards Gladys’s desk she said, “Already called a cab, they will pick you up in twenty minutes at the main entrance downstairs, have a safe trip home.” As I headed to the restroom for a pit stop, I noticed one of the brokers had started following me when I left the trading room. When I was washing my hands, he walked over to one of the urinals, and said, “How did it go with Earl son”. “Good, he offered me a job as a broker and said he would get a formal offer out to me in the next few days”, I replied. “Are ya going to take the job, wait, don’t answer that, I apologize, it’s none of my business. Let me start over. My name is Wilson, and I started working here fifty years ago when I was 25 years old, fresh out of college”. My dad died at 76 after working here his whole life, and I will probably end up in the same boat. Since Wilson was still standing at the urinal, I sensed that it was going to take him awhile to finish his conversation as well as his personal business, so I leaned against the sink, folded my arms, and made myself comfortable.

“There isn’t a day that goes by that I don’t think about how time has flown by, and that I have basically spent my whole adult working life, surrounded by the four walls of my office. This business can be very cruel because you witness a lot of bad things that can happen to hard working farmers and ranchers, that are good, salt of the earth people. And on top of that, you do the same thing, day in a day out, in a town that has one week of good weather in the spring, and one week of good weather in the fall. The rest of the year it's either hot and humid, or freezing cold.

When he finally finished, he walked over to the other sink, as I was thinking to myself, that he could have drained an entire community swimming pool, in the time it took him to go to the bathroom. I then looked over at him, as he was looking me in the eye, and he said, "Take my advice son, and don't waste your life like I did. If I had it to do all over again, I would have treated my career as a string of many adventures, doing what I love to do, changing things up whenever I got bored, and experiencing everything life had to offer, where the weather was nice, and shunned the expectations of others. I would have surrounded myself with inspirational people and avoided the toxic people that brought me down, and prevented me from following my dreams" I am thinking to myself, boy, I guess it was a bad day at the office for old Wilson, who then finished his speech with, "If I were lucky enough to be in your shoes right now, I would get in that cab, go to the airport, get on that plane, get as far away from this place as you possibly can, and never look back." I then responded by saying, "Thanks for the advice, Wilson". He then replied, "Your very welcome, what did you say your name was again", "I didn't", I said, "it's Dave, I mean, Dave never coming back here again Rossiter". As I am walking out of the restroom, I am thinking to myself, that I should have reciprocated and offered up some sage advice to Wilson, such as, I am no doctor, Wilson, but you may want to consider getting that prostate of yours checked out.

I made the turn onto I-25, having just bid farewell to my mom, and began the 18-hour drive to Phoenix Arizona, to start my first post college job/adventure, at a bank of all places. I am trying to visualize what my very first business card will look like. Probably something like this;

The Valley National Bank of Arizona
Agricultural Lending Department
David L. Rossiter
Management Training Program

I began to accelerate, heading in a southwesterly direction, and reminded myself that I was putting even more distance between me and Des Moines Iowa, and that was a good thing.

“Never mistake knowledge for wisdom. One helps you make a living; the other helps you make a life.”

Sandra Carey

“You went over your thirty minutes again tonight dad, but that’s ok, your stories were pretty interesting again, especially learning about how you decided not to go to vet school”, said Kelli. Then Max said, “That Sammy guy seemed like he was pretty bright and insightful. And it was sure nice of Wilson to take the time to give you some life wisdom about your future career”. “I have a real surprise for next week’s session”, said Daphne, with a devious grin on her face. “I will give you a hint, it has to do with business cards”. “Can’t wait”, I replied, wondering what brand of sarcastic surprise she was going to spring on us. “See everyone next Sunday after Max’s Ironman race”, I said.

